Government determined to reduce farmland

by DARREN SMITH

‘BY controlling food one can control people, and by controlling energy one can control nations and their financial systems’ – Henry Kissinger.

Depending on the source, it is estimated that Britain imports between 45 and 80 per cent of its food. The higher figure is due to the importing of raw ingredients, such as tea, which are then processed in the UK and then no longer counted as imports.

Even if we take the lower estimates, the push by the government to plaster prime growing land with industrial solar panels and wind turbines, nearly always despite the express objections of councils and residents, should be viewed as lunacy.

While some may have been scared into believing there is a climate and energy crisis due to decades of propaganda, hardly anyone believes this is the solution.

Because there are better technologies, better locations and better science available, one can only conclude that this policy is to further reduce Britain’s ability to feed itself, and force us to rely even more on imports and processed, low-quality food.

Together with the bribes being offered to farmers to quit, plus plans to ‘re-wild’ ten per cent or more of our farmland, it seems the UK Government is adhering to Kissinger’s plan to give control of our nation’s food supply to foreign bodies.

The Planning and Infrastructure Bill currently going through parliament will also allow the state to compulsorily purchase and repurpose any land it wants, including allotments, smallholdings and farms.

One wonders if we are being punished for voting for independence from the EU in 2016; particularly when we look at our apparent inability to control our borders, allowing a huge influx of illegal migrants, which we pay billions every year to house, feed, clothe and look after, only for many to commit crimes against us, particularly women and children.

Since journalist Patrick Christys from GB News showed how easily anyone can enter Britain without any documentation, one can only conclude that these are deliberately malfeasant policies to prove our desire to be a strong, independent nation again was foolhardy, and that we need to be back under the thumb of international organisations to manage our affairs. Is this to discourage other countries from also leaving the EU?

The people are being deceived, and are rightly angry about the consequences of the government’s policies, but are often being led to focus their attention at the wrong culprits, presumably to incite violence.

As Essex police were caught escorting masked-up, far-left counter-protestors to the Bell Hotel in Epping in July, this conclusion seems very likely.

It is clearly the government, its ministers and agents that are causing misery in communities by both allowing and paying for hundreds of thousands of people that have no right to be here. They could stop it and deport them if they actually wanted to.

Genuine refugees from war-torn countries are welcome, but we have not seen a huge influx of Palestinians in recent years, for some reason.

Instead, we are inundated with young men who are not escaping conflict, many of whom have no desire to become contributing, hard-working members of society. This is by design, to break the country down.

More people, less food. More crime, fewer jobs – exacerbated of course by the push for AI and digitisation. Perhaps the solar installations and industrialisation of the countryside is to supply huge new data centres that will run the robots and the surveillance systems in the smart cities long-planned for by the banking overlords to control the people.

Although Starmer’s regime is ruthlessly accelerating this plan, it is politicians of all colours over the decades that have enabled the destruction of our once-great nation. Only the people, standing together, can stop this selling-out of our future.

We can only end tyranny by ceasing to support it

THEY are not afraid of violence – they revel in it.

They are not afraid of words; they are impervious to them.

They are not afraid of large protests; they have trained for them.

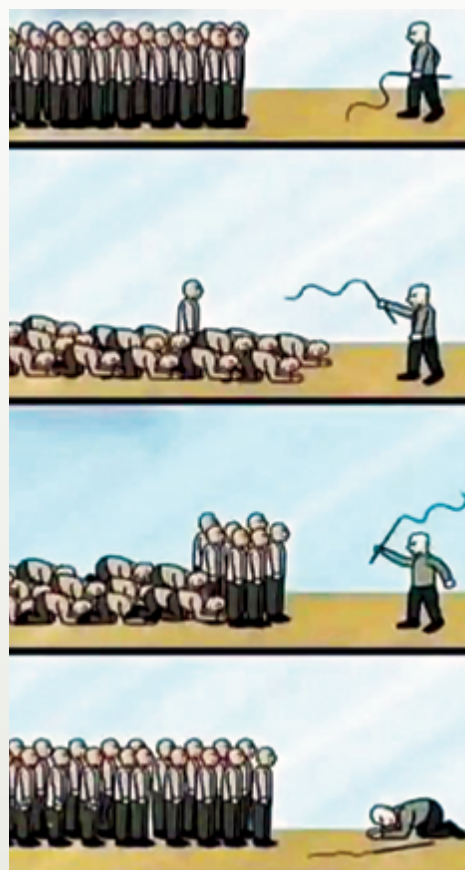

They are certainly not afraid of their own well-funded, controlled opposition leaders, of which there are many.

Do you know what they are afraid of?

That people stop believing in their power.

That people stop paying them through unfair taxes, charges, fines, interest on debts and continuous corporate spending.

That people find their own power and inner strength and the courage to say no, and deal with whatever consequences tyranny then throws at them – normally just scary-looking letters which do nothing and can go straight in the bin.

‘What about my credit rating and my job and knocks on the door from menacing debt collection goons?’

Well, how good is your life right now while complying with this tyranny?

How good is life going to be if we just carry on being afraid and paying up?

If you’re prepared to protest and shout and post, why wouldn’t you be prepared to deal with the sanctions from this world of lies and violence and tyranny, in order to make it a better one for your children?

We have seen the same tactics over and over again – divide and rule, point the finger of blame at the wrong people, smear and call ordinary people hateful names because we care and know that life should not be this way, and doesn’t have to be.

Who facilitated the mass immigration?

Who or what gives them the authority to tell anyone what to do?

Why do you continue to pay them, work for them and be afraid of their bureaucracy when it has no legitimacy?

And if you think voting, for anyone at all, is going to change a single thing, then they still have you under their spell.

Government should have no power that the people does not give it. We’ve already been through this, centuries ago, which is why we have the Bill of Rights 1689, which along with a few other foundational laws is the cornerstone of our ‘democracy’ and freedom. Did you even know? Because they don’t teach you it in their schools. Previous generations have already spilled the blood to give us our freedom from tyranny, but we are letting their sacrifice be in vain by not upholding the law.

Your taxes fund the boats, the planes, the hotels, as well as the wars, the assassinations and the disgustingly lavish lifestyles of the rulers, while ordinary people struggle and starve and go without. Your money in their banks, investment vehicles and pension funds. Your spending in their stores and online behemoths.

Clear your debts. Deal direct wherever possible. Take your money out and start a business or buy a building or invest in a local farm. The power is in our hands, but we are misdirected to gather outside hotels or march down streets or shout at the TV or the police and it achieves exactly nothing but frustration and demoralisation and often even more tyranny.

A mass withdrawal of funding and smart redeployment of resources ends this madness. Refusing to comply with anything they want stops them in their tracks. Imagine if everyone had done that during the covid deception – nobody wore a mask, nobody showed a health pass, nobody got a shot. It would have lasted two minutes.

They only have the power that you give them – that you believe they deserve; and in truth, they deserve nothing but contempt and ridicule.

It’s time to grow strong again like our forefathers, realise the full extent of what is happening and where this ends: digital ID and programmable digital currency meaning total control over your life. Your children and theirs will never know the freedom and choices you had.

Stop calling it a ‘conspiracy theory’, because this is clearly their end goal now and the plan is being put in place right in front of your eyes: those cameras and Rings and Alexas and facial scanners and 5G towers are not there for your safety or convenience. In some places they are being taken down, but it needs to be in all places, because they are only there for a digital control grid to be built to monitor everyone, everywhere, all the time. Replace your smartphone or leave it at home.

Start a local store selling local products. Bring the community together. Brew your own and develop places to meet, offline, in the real world.

There are tons of answers, but until people stop being misled into doing exactly what the tyrants want us to do, they will not be heard or acted upon.

We are now entering the crucial period where WE decide what the future will be: one of total digitisation where algorithms and powerful psychopaths decide what you can eat and where you can travel to, or one where we go back to the natural world where value is exchanged and multiplied through human industriousness and ingenuity and cooperation, and the internet is used for what it could be good for – the free flow of information and knowledge, and instant multimedia communication. Not surveillance. Not manipulation. Not total control.

You decide, right now, today and in every moment from now on, what action you will take to steer your life and therefore the world towards the future we all want to see and know is possible. We have but a short time; will we choose love, or fear?

Police told to ignore vaccine damage

Operation Talla instructed officers to treat complaints as ‘dissent’

by SALLY BECK

SCOTTISH police were told to ‘reject’ potential criminal complaints relating to covid measures and vaccinations, a freedom of information (FOI) request has revealed.

Instead of concerns being investigated, those reporting covid issues were suspected of criminal behaviour, had their names recorded and were then tracked, a move that could amount to the offence of nonfeasance in a public office (a public official’s failure to perform a required duty).

On January 25, 2022, Scotland’s Deputy Chief Constable (DCC) Alan Speirs issued a statement about those working in settings related to the covid-19 vaccine. A video shows citizens at Govan police station attempting to submit evidence of vaccine-related deaths.

DCC Speirs’s memo was addressed to ‘all officers and staff’. It said: ‘We are aware of individuals attending police stations or calling police to either report what they believe to be criminal offences relating to the vaccine or to request police support in their attempts to “serve” papers on staff and volunteers or to shut down facilities.

‘In some cases, these individuals have claimed that a police investigation is taking place into criminal allegations relating to the UK’s vaccine programme.

‘The Metropolitan Police Service (MPS) received a complaint and a number of documents on 20 December 2021. The MPS provided the complainers with a crime reference number and is reviewing the content of the documents.

‘However, the MPS has been clear that nothing has been found to suggest any offences or grounds for an investigation, and that no such investigation is taking place.

‘Should any officer or member of staff be approached or contacted by people requesting assistance in line with any of the above, then these requests should be rejected.

‘While we continue to uphold individuals’ rights to freedom of expression and to protest, this must be balanced with the rights of others, keeping the public safe, preventing crime and disorder, and seeking to minimise disruption.

‘None of the type of behaviour outlined above should be considered as protest activity and could in fact constitute criminal activity.’

Police attacking a peaceful protest in Trafalgar Square, London in 2020

The MPS complaint DCC Speirs is referring to was submitted by two lawyers, a doctor and a former police officer all well aware of the law. They had hundreds of documents alleging the law had been broken in the name of covid. On December 20, 2021, solicitor Lois Bayliss, of Broad Yorkshire Law, Dr Sam White, a former partner from a Hampshire GP practice, solicitor Philip Hyland of PJH Law, and former police officer Mark Sexton submitted a complaint at Hammersmith police station.

Mr Hyland said it alleged ‘negligence, misfeasance, corporate manslaughter and misconduct in a public office’. The police listened to their concerns for four hours and the team were given a crime number, 6029679/21, and an internet link to upload evidence. Detective Sergeant Mallett, Detective Inspector Struthers and Detective Constable Hussey were assigned as their designated contacts. The team did as they were asked and uploaded hundreds of documents backing their claim, then without explanation, the investigation was dropped in February 2022, not long after DCC Speirs’s statement.

Instead, the police were instructed to continue with Operation Talla in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, while Operation Norden ran in tandem with Talla in Scotland. Insiders claim that Op Norden was almost exclusively an intelligence-gathering operation. Both were introduced in March 2020, after the World Health Organisation declared a pandemic. Op Talla was a co-ordinated police initiative designed to reinforce pandemic measures, despite their alleged illegality. Guidance was published on the advice of the National Police Chiefs’ Council (NPCC), who co-ordinate national police efforts, and the UK Gold Command Structure, which includes senior police and government officials. Gold Command was instrumental in making decisions and issuing directives during the pandemic.

On the surface it was about ensuring public safety and protecting police officers, but evidence has emerged that it also involved intelligence-gathering and tracking individuals and groups expressing dissent. It worked in tandem with the Counter-Disinformation Unit (CDU) framed as ‘preventing radicalisation’ or addressing ‘health extremism’.

Headmaster Mike Fairclough, from West Rise School, Eastbourne, was a target. He spoke up for children during the pandemic, objecting to masking, the closing of schools and vaccination as children were at minimal risk from covid. His lawful response put him under scrutiny at the highest levels, and he found out through FOI that he had been monitored by the CDU and their Department for Counter Extremism. This was after a complaint to East Sussex County Council, who cleared him of any wrongdoing.

Journalists were targeted too. The organisation Big Brother Watch produced a report titled ‘Ministry of Truth’. On page 13, it describes how Talk Radio presenter, Julia Hartley-Brewer, was featured repeatedly in the Covid-19 Mis/Disinformation Platform Terms of Service report commissioned by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport (DCMS). Ms Hartley-Brewer discovered this after she submitted a subject access request (SAR) that confirmed she was included in the ‘reports of online activity’ section.

Campaigners are now asking whether DCC Speirs’s directive and the resulting crushing of evidence amounts to ‘nonfeasance in public office’. Nonfeasance refers to the omission of an act that ought to have been performed – for example, taking seriously complaints about the covid vaccine and harmful pandemic measures.

How much harm could have been prevented if the police had investigated? The pandemic was overshadowed by collateral damage caused by pandemic measures. Over 3,000 covid vaccine-related deaths and more than 500,000 serious adverse events were reported to the Yellow Card scheme run by the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency (MHRA). According to the Office for National Statistics, nearly 700,000 (11.8 per cent) British businesses disappeared in 2021 and 2022 thanks to covid restrictions. (The Institute of Directors also blamed the cost-of-living crisis and the economic fallout from Russia’s invasion of Ukraine.) More women died because of domestic abuse during lockdown, the highest number for 11 years. In the first three weeks of lockdown there were 16 domestic abuse killings of women and children in the UK. The final total is not known. Then there are the ‘ghost children’, vulnerable kids who disappeared from the school system by summer 2022. Exact numbers are not available, but the figure is between 100,000 and 140,000. Finally, more than 50,000 elderly died in care homes because of draconian pandemic measures which were so concerning that Amnesty International investigated.

Late last month, lawyer Ian Clayton from the organisation Ethical Approach, who monitor and gather evidence about the actions of UK-based regulators, sent a letter to Police Scotland’s professional standards department suggesting that sanctioning people trying to raise awareness of covid crimes is nonfeasance, a crime that can result in civil or criminal damages.

It was ‘a serious dereliction of this statutory function’, Mr Clayton said. Adding: ‘The duty of constables to investigate reported crime is a cornerstone of lawful policing under the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012. The blanket refusal to accept or consider such reports – solely based on subject matter – is a serious dereliction of this statutory function.

‘The onus is now on Police Scotland to come back and provide their perspective or provide justifications of their alleged nonfeasance.’

MPs work for warmongers

New definition for politicians another stepping stone to tyranny

by MARCUS BLACKETT

ALEX Kriel of the Thinking Coalition substack recently spotted a potentially game-changing rewrite of our Members of Parliaments' job description on the government's website.

If he had not taken a screenshot of the previous description under the title 'What does an MP do?', it might have gone unnoticed.

Many of us have always been somewhat suspicious – to say the least – that MPs do not represent us – but now the MP's central role in our democratic tradition of 'parliamentary sovereignty' could have disappeared without trace, had the government's sleight of hand not been exposed.

The previous wording was: 'The UK public elects members of Parliament (MPs) to represent their interests and concerns in the House of Commons. MPs can consider and can propose new laws as well as raising issues that matter to you in the House. This includes asking government ministers questions about current issues, including those which affect local constituents.'

This job description was then changed to: 'MPs work both at the UK Parliament and in their local constituencies. How and where they work is largely up to them to decide. There is no job description or contracts of employment for MPs, nor any rules on how they should balance the competing demands of these two roles. However, MPs must abide by standards of conduct, rules and conventions.'

All reference to elections and representations has been removed from the page, and it suggests that an MP's constituency work is now of secondary consideration. Not that our democracy was by any means perfect beforehand – but these changes have no doubt been made deliberately.

In the child's game 'Grandma's Footsteps', players try to sneak up on Grandma before she turns and spots them, sending them back to where they started. The term 'totalitarian tiptoe' is a metaphor used to describe how technocratic functionaries seed their ideology into our democratic system incrementally, changing that system over numerous election cycles, hoping that no one will notice.

We must insist that they get sent back to the metaphorical beginning and the original job description be reinstated.

The current Houses of Parliament were built between 1840 and 1870. Photo: Jamie Street

Even better would be to assemble a group of constitutional experts to write the job description from scratch.

There has been a deafening silence from the mainstream media about these changes, which illustrates their ignorance or collusion with the aim of keeping us ignorant, distracted and divided.

Social media illustrates how our 'representative democracy' invariably fails to reflect popular opinion. Indeed, MPs fail to respond to what's trending, and the Westminster executive simply overrides the wishes of the electorate.

Rather than actually representing constituents' views in parliament, the tendency is towards dictating policy impositions to constituents without any meaningful consent from them. When MPs cease representing the people, we end up with a quasi-dictatorial top-down system of government, which, if the people were genuinely consulted about it, they would summarily reject.

In reality, most decisions in parliament are made by people we've never heard of. The true ruling power of our country operates unseen mechanisms, moulding our minds, forming our tastes, organising our habits and suggesting ideas to manufacture consent.

We would never have consented to regime change in Iraq had the public not been gaslit into believing Saddam Hussein had 'weapons of mass destruction'.

That example is one among many. Since the Act of Union created the United Kingdom in 1707, parliament has sanctioned at least 73 conflicts and wars. Our country has been at war almost continuously, in one way or the other, somewhere in the world for well over 200 years.

Two of these wars are ongoing (nowadays they are proxy wars) in Ukraine and Israel. Since World War II, parliament has passed the mantle of proxy world policeman to the U.S. Congress, and they have managed, on the City of London's behalf, 173 of the 245 conflicts in regions of the world since then.

The 'master of war' (aka the deep state) that Tulsi Gabbard, the U.S. Director of National Intelligence, is apparently looking to confront is the 450-year-old British financial empire, for which the U.S. is the world policeman.

Hidden in plain sight amidst the pomp and ceremony of state institutions such as The Lord Mayor's Show, the coronation and the state opening of parliament lies the ambiguous relationship between the City of London, the Crown, and Westminster – where the real mechanism of power resides.

The answer to the question, 'what does an MP do?', cannot explain how parliament approves what is totally at odds to the views of the electorate. More than half the MPs are new, and the pomp, pageantry and traditions into which they have suddenly been thrust, blinds them like rabbits caught in the headlights.

Perhaps a more pertinent question would be: 'what does an MP not do?' The answer is they do not have any influence over parliament's appetite for war, other than to resign, which defeats the purpose of them being there.

And now, a third description for MPs has appeared on the government's website. Perhaps changed after pressure from members of the public, it now begins with: 'Members of Parliament (MPs) are sent to the House of Commons from every part of the UK to represent local people and ensure they have a voice in national decisions.'

An improvement, but more needs to be done to ensure our MPs are truly representing the people they are supposed to serve.

Children schooled into silence

Pupils who question authority are threat to system of control

by NEIL BRYAN

THE first thing we are taught at school is not how to read, write or reason – it is how to obey.

Before phonics and times tables come the silent signals. Raise your hand to speak. Don't move without permission. Sit still, face forward, and repeat after me.

Questions are only welcomed if they are easy to answer. And heaven help the child who speaks from instinct – the one who tilts their head and asks: "But why?"

Because 'why' is dangerous. It threatens the edifice. It tugs at the curtain. And in a society increasingly defined by managed perception, nothing is more terrifying than a child who sees clearly.

We call it education. But let's not lie to ourselves. School, as it stands in the modern industrialised West, is not designed to liberate minds – it is designed to standardise them. To process the infinite curiosity of a human soul into measurable outcomes. To mould that soul into a worker. A follower. A compliant unit of productivity. And in that process, something is lost. Not just creativity, but sovereignty. Not just intelligence, but trust – in oneself, in one's instincts, and in the quiet inner compass that says: "This doesn't feel right."

We are schooled into silence. Not overtly, not with gag orders and handcuffs, but with soft mechanisms of behavioural control. Praise for obedience. Punishment for disruption.

It is the subtle message that your value lies not in who you are, but in how well you comply. The child who memorises and mimics is the good one. The child who questions the structure, who wanders off the page, who challenges the premise – that child is difficult. Disruptive. Possibly diagnosable.

They give labels now, to the spirited ones. Oppositional defiant disorder. ADHD. Conduct disorder. Wrap it up in psychobabble, prescribe them something that makes them easier to handle, and call it compassion. But what are we really medicating? Attention? Emotion? Or resistance to a culture that no longer serves human thriving?

Look around. The grown-ups schooled into silence are everywhere.

They line up for instructions. They outsource their authority. They second-guess their instincts and hand over their children to be trained in the same rituals of quiet compliance.

They scroll through curated digital worlds, nodding along to official narratives, not because they believe them, but because questioning feels unsafe. The punishment now is social – cancellation, ostracism, the modern stocks. But the game is the same. Keep your head down. Don't ask too many questions. Keep calm and consume.

And the cost? The cost is a generation too afraid to feel, too distracted to think, and too domesticated to rebel.

Let's not pretend it's accidental. The education system is not broken – it is doing precisely what it was designed to do. It produces citizens, not revolutionaries. It rewards memorisation, not critical thought. It turns children into data points, and eventually, debt carriers.

By age six, most children know there's a 'right' answer. By age twelve, they know which parts of themselves to hide. By age sixteen, many have already learned to perform, suppress, and self-edit for the approval of systems that do not love them. And so the wildness is lost. The spark. The essential rebel that exists in every child. The one that asks: "What if the Emperor is naked?" The one who refuses to pledge allegiance to absurdity.

That rebel is the one thing this system fears most because a questioning child becomes a questioning adult. And a questioning adult does not blindly follow orders, does not swallow lies about war, or safety, or what's in the water, the food, or the jab.

A questioning adult reads between the lines. They notice the contradiction. They retain their capacity to say no, even when everyone else is saying yes.

Which is why they're trying to remove that capacity as early as possible. Through rigid curricula. Through algorithmic learning platforms that assess speed over depth. Through constant surveillance – of screens, emotions, and now even thoughts.

Schools are no longer communities of learning. They are training grounds for social conformity. Just look at the trend: uniformity in dress, speech, opinion. A reduction of the arts.

There is criminalisation of daydreaming.

Children are being sedated with dopamine tricks and behavioural charts, while their inner world is quietly exiled from the classroom.

But there is another way. It begins with remembering what education used to mean. Not instruction, but drawing out. From the Latin, 'educere': to lead forth what is already within.

Imagine if schools honoured that. If they saw children not as empty vessels, but as wisdom-bearers, with an intuitive connection to truth, wonder, and play. Imagine if emotion was not a disorder, but a language. Imagination should not be extra-curricular, but central to learning.

And imagine, too, what would happen if more adults remembered their own wildness, their own questions, their own childhood instincts that know something isn't right.

The truth is those instincts were never wrong. The systems are unjust. The stories don't add up. And those who still feel that dissonance – even quietly – are not crazy. They are awake. Perhaps only half-awake, but that's enough to begin.

If you still question – if you still ache when you see children being moulded into quieter, sadder, more manageable versions of themselves – then you are not the problem.

You are the antidote.

We've all been schooled. But it's not too late to unlearn.

The child who questions is the threat. Let's be that child again.

Testing times for maintaining freedom

DNA database for babies and digital ID looming in 2030

by DR. MICHAEL POULIN

ACCORDING to the BBC, the 'NHS plans to DNA test all babies to assess disease risk'.

The NHS is the UK government-funded medical and health care service that everyone living in the country can use without being asked to pay the full cost.

And it is common knowledge that a DNA test is very expensive. The government plans to pay for it with taxpayers' money but without asking for their consent. If we have a dilemma – cost versus reason – the reasons must be quite solid. A common medical practice knows that almost all inherited genetic diseases are identified without DNA tests by the age of three to five years.

In other words, these tests are not necessary at the proposed scale.

According to BBC: 'Every newborn baby in England will have their DNA mapped.'

It seems that the word 'mapped' is the key – so far, the mapping of people to DNA has been the preserve of the judicial system aiming at suspected criminals. So if the dominant majority of illnesses that require DNA analysis may be identified without the DNA tests, should we suggest that this initiative of the NHS makes all of us suspects?

This totalitarian idea is part of 'the government's 10-year plan for the NHS'.

Well, many people might be curious about what gives this government an assurance that the elections of 2026 (local) and 2029 (general) would keep them in power.

This plan may be scrapped but tens of thousands of our future Brits will be mapped already.

And this move comes after a 'study analysing the genetic code of up to 100,000 babies'.

Was this study legal, did parents agree to this test, or were they tricked into it?

The BBC article continues: 'Funding for the new initiative will also support efforts by Genomics England to build one of the world's largest research databases.'

'The scheme is part of a government drive towards predicting and preventing illness, which will also see £650m invested in DNA research for all patients by 2030.'

If the government's plan is for ten years, what is so special about 2030 which is only five years away?

The answer could lie within the government's solution for DIPP – Digital Identity for Physical Person – a digital label for each individual that silently collects information about personal activities online, and is linked to the physical person.

At the same time, the government is aiming to make the UK a navel of AI technology, at least in Europe (using developers from Indian companies) that fits nicely with DIPP.

Both DIPP and the AI goals are scheduled to be achieved by 2030.

And then we have the United Nations Sustainable Development Goal 16 which is to provide legal identity for all, including birth registration, by 2030.

So it is no coincidence that 2030 has been chosen in the UK as the date for the 'goal of containing over 500,000 genomes' for the database.

The mousetrap with the good intention of 'predicting and preventing illness' being used as bait could be about to slam shut on our freedom – in just five years' time.

But all is not lost. It is possible to create a unique digital identity for all populations on Earth without government monitoring of our digital activities online, so this game is not over yet.

Porn addictive as crack cocaine

Brain rewired by limitless access to sex videos

by JASON WORTH

SOME claim pornography is just a rite of passage for teenagers, and that watching it can be part of a normal, healthy sex life.

And yet evidence is emerging that pornography can lead to erectile dysfunction, low energy, brain fog, insomnia, loss of attraction to real partners, severe social anxiety, depression and suicidal thoughts.

So how can something that is said to be harmless on the one hand be potentially deadly on the other?

The answer, perhaps, lies at the intersection of modern internet video streaming technology and human biology. We now have an abundance of easy-access, free porn video clips (much of which you could call ‘hardcore’) available at the click of a button.

What was once innocent adolescent development – coming across a nudie magazine like Penthouse or grainy VHS tape at a friend’s house – has evolved into high-bandwidth video streaming.

And it didn’t take long before websites proliferated and offered unlimited porn clips across dozens of genres. The slang term for multi-genre, high-bandwidth porn sites is ‘tubes’ – because they serve up videos just like YouTube.

And to use a drug analogy, if nudie mags and video tapes were like marijuana, these tubes are crack cocaine.

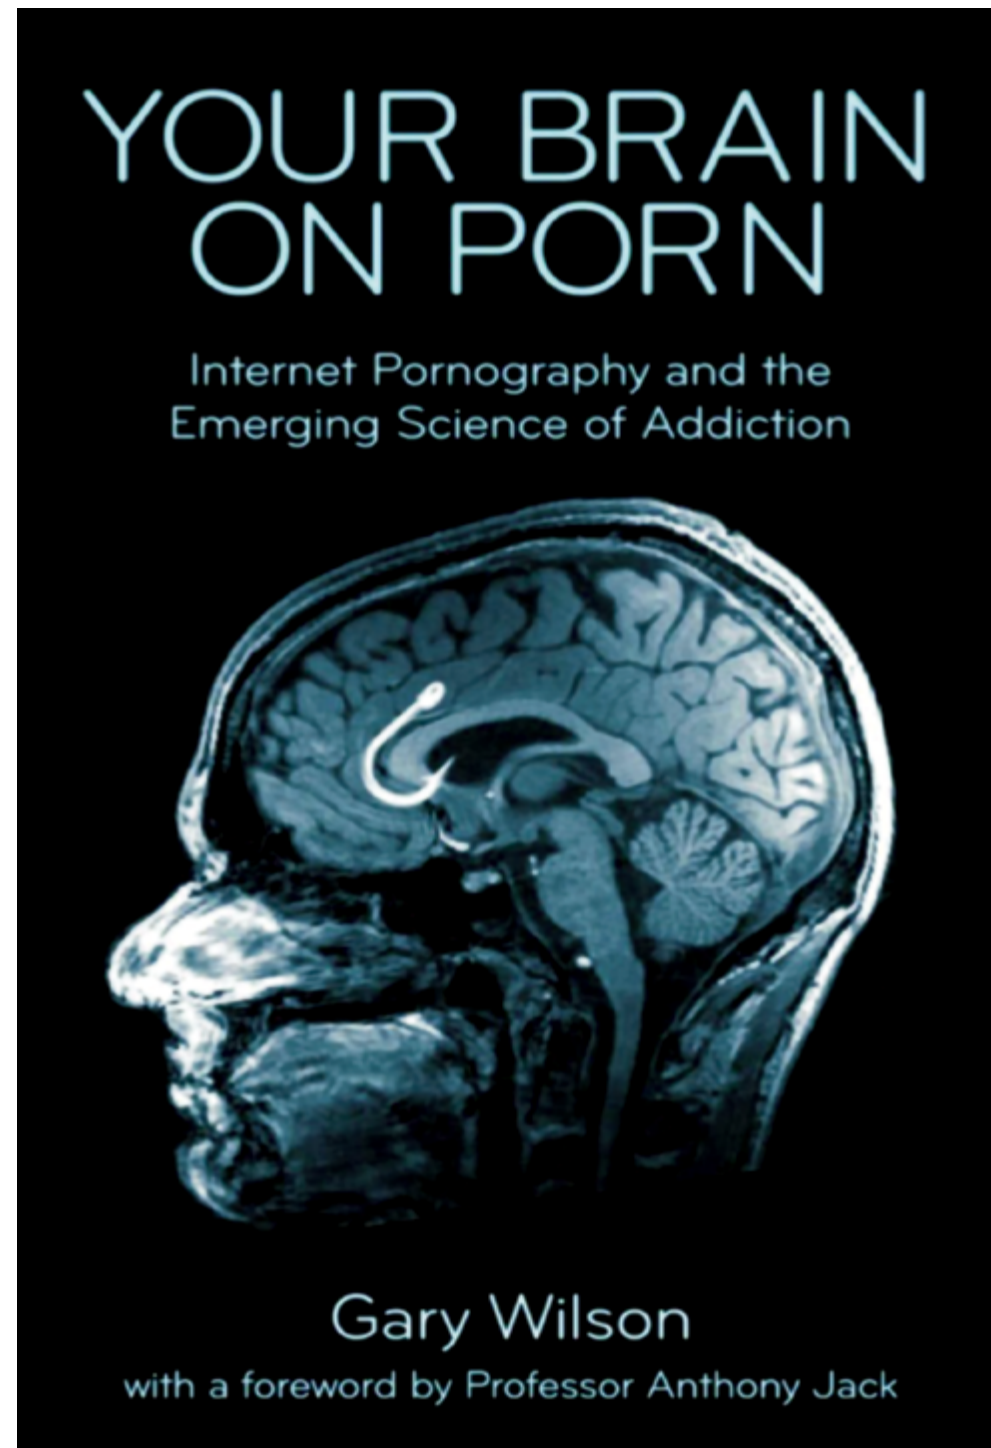

To understand why tubes are the porn equivalent of crack, we need to understand the physiology behind pornography. Thousands of years of adaptation and Darwinian self-selection have resulted in a human male species that craves sex.

You’ve undoubtedly heard the expression that men always have sex on the brain, and there’s a lot of truth to that. You and I are walking the Earth today because our fathers and forefathers were horny bastards.

And they were that way because their brains were programmed to seek sexual pleasure and gratification. In fact, biochemists have identified that upon sexual climax, the human brain rewards us with a surge of dopamine. And the human body likes dopamine.

Dopamine is also what is released when humans abuse hard drugs like heroin and methamphetamine, and there is no question that those are addicting substances. Porn can be also.

Porn abusers suffer a tolerance factor not unlike alcoholics or drug addicts who need to drink or smoke more each time to get the same buzz.

Gary Wilson’s new book - Your Brain On Porn

Dopamine surges also trigger the production of a protein called DeltaFosB which is said to accumulate slowly in the reward circuitry in proportion to the amount of dopamine released when we chronically indulge in natural rewards (sex, sugar, high fat, aerobic exercise) or drug abuse.

Dopamine and DeltaFosB work in tandem to make porn addictive to the human brain. Scientists have proven that dopamine production declines when you watch the same porn scene over and over, but switch the channel and watch something new, and you can get dopamine levels back up, temporarily.

In fact, porn abusers will often seek to keep themselves close to the point of climax, without actually climaxing. It’s something called ‘edging’ and porn users do this because it is the point at which they are able to maximize their exposure to dopamine.

This is where the tubes come in. It is not uncommon for high-use porn users to switch from video clip to video clip, in some cases with multiple videos playing on one or more computer monitors at the same time; all in the quest of keeping the dopamine-producing part of their brain in high gear.

New, novel and unexpected scenes will trigger more dopamine. And as porn abusing males build up a dopamine tolerance, they can fool their brains into producing more dopamine by surprising it with new, novel and unexpected scenes.

This can involve watching more graphic scenes in different genres of porn. Depending upon your moral compass, watching porn can become a slippery slope drawing you down into ever more extreme and questionable things, all served up via an all-you-can-eat buffet from tube providers who have them nicely categorized by porn genre and made available free of charge.

Until recently, there were no real age verification services in place to prevent underage viewing of these tubes, this meant that children of any age were able to access and view this material. And, for years, many of them have.

In fact, this is where the already troublesome aspects of brain conditioning via dopamine addiction becomes further magnified, because adolescents still in their growth and development stages can have their brain circuitry ‘mis-wired’ at an early age.

The medical term here is neuroplasticity, and it means our actions can have a direct impact on our brain physiology and development. There is an expression among neurologists that ‘neurons that fire together, wire together’.

Young brains watching too much porn can potentially cause their brains to develop in a way that is harmful to their long-term development. It is claimed that neurologists have found that increased exposure to pornography results in fewer nerve connection pathways in sections of the reward circuitry (striatum) involved in motivation and decision-making.

Because this is a relatively new affliction, and one that many porn addicts are not inclined to discuss publicly, some of the medical community has been largely caught unawares.

And if matters are raised with a doctor, how many of them will be aware of the connections between too much porn viewing and symptoms like erectile dysfunction, anxiety and depression?

Even if the patient did bring up their porn usage, a large portion of the medical community may still view it as part of a normal, healthy sex life – without realising that it has the potential to rewire our brains and leave us trapped in addiction.

Campaigners launch legal food fight

New law allows some GM products to remain undeclared

by BEYOND GM

THE government is facing a legal challenge after bringing in regulations that fundamentally change how genetically modified organisms are regulated in England.

The Genetic Technology (Precision Breeding) Regulations 2025 create a new category of GMOs, called 'precision-bred organisms' (PBOs), and exempt these from the food and environmental safety requirements of other types of GMOs.

This is a sleight of hand that has serious implications for the environment and the food system.

It allows these precision-bred GMOs to enter the food system and wider environment without labelling, without adequate traceability systems, and without any proper safety testing or impact assessments.

Our food system shapes our environment, and we can't protect either without transparent and truthful information that allows us to make informed choices and take informed actions.

These new regulations take all that away:

- Consumers have lost the right to know and make choices about genetically modified PBOs in their food.
- Organic and biodynamic farmers and food producers still have a legal obligation to avoid contamination with all GMOs, including PBOs. The new regulations take away the necessary tools and processes to ensure the integrity of organic products – resulting in a loss of consumer confidence and trade.
- Artisanal, traditional, natural and geographical indication farmers and food producers will also find it difficult and expensive (if not impracticable) to avoid contamination, risking the integrity of their brands.
- The environment is at risk since all GMOs can interact with wild and fragile ecosystems in unpredictable ways: they can multiply, persist and quickly become dominant.
- Devolved nations Scotland and Wales have explicitly said they don't want to grow or sell GMOs and yet the Westminster government intends to force unlabelled precision-bred GMOs into their markets.

And now GMO campaign group, Beyond GM, has launched a legal action against the government over the new regulations.

A spokesperson from Beyond GM said:

"When democratic processes fail, and regulations are pushed through that threaten our food system, environment and basic rights to know what we're eating, legal challenge becomes the only option.

"The regulation of genetically modified organisms requires us to set limits, to assess impacts and to work within the law.

"Our legal team at Leigh Day and Matrix Chambers has identified serious potential illegalities in the Genetic Technology Regulations, including breaches of the Human Rights Act, the Aarhus Convention and the Habitats Directive.

"They have also identified areas of overreach where the regulations go beyond what parliament has authorised, for instance, preventing any safety testing that could reveal problems with these organisms.

"In light of this, we have sent a pre-action letter to Defra Secretary of State, Steve Reed, putting the government on notice that we intend to pursue a judicial review."

The spokesperson added that the aim was to have the new regulations revoked before they became operational in November, that a full impact assessment should be performed and that a new, more robust and inclusive process should be put in place to rewrite them in a way that was responsive to the needs of citizens and the natural world.

They added: "Legal challenges are expensive and have several stages. We're facing a well-resourced government department with deep pockets and teams of lawyers whose job is to (sometimes) defend the indefensible.

"We estimate we need to raise £37,575 in the next 30 days to take us to the next phase of the case and significantly more – circa £100,000 – to cover legal costs and liabilities over the whole of the action. If we don't reach this first funding goal, we are unlikely to be able to continue.

"To make donations easier and to ensure every penny goes straight to our legal team, we are using the CrowdJustice platform."

Meanwhile, GMO news and comment site GMWatch and other concerned groups have engaged in good faith with the Westminster government, the farm ministry Defra, and the Food Standards Agency, in discussions on the Genetic Technology (Precision Breeding) Regulations 2025.

A spokesperson from GMWatch said: "At every stage we advocated for a rigorous evidence-based approach to assessing the risks of so-called precision-bred GMOs, as well as calling for transparency and accountability by maintaining traceability and labelling requirements.

"These elements are the minimum needed to ensure that public health and the environment are protected. There has to be farmer and consumer choice over whether to grow and eat GMOs.

"But the authorities refused to listen at any point and failed to implement even the most basic safety and transparency measures around these new experimental GMOs. In its reckless moves, which prioritise commercial interests over those of the public, the Westminster government may well have broken national and international law. That's why we fully support this legal action against the government initiated by Beyond GM."

Artificial intelligence called out

Electronic line-calling embarrassment for Wimbledon

by SERENA WYLDE

THE Wimbledon tennis championships have eliminated human line judges in favour of an electronic line-calling system that booms the word 'out' robotically when a ball falls beyond the designated line. That is, until it stops working.

A spokesperson for the All England Lawn Tennis Club (AELTC) said investigations revealed the automated system was “deactivated in error on part of the server’s side of the court, for one game, by those operating the system”. The error favoured a British player, as her Russian opponent was serving from the affected side where no balls were being called out.

If the automated system is operated by humans behind the scenes, is it any less fallible than human line judges standing court-side in full view of everyone, with players able to ask for electronic verification if in doubt?

The incident happened in a fourth round ladies singles match between Sonay Kartal and Anastasia Pavlyuchenkova. Three line calls were missed by the electronic line-calling system during the service game of Pavlyuchenkova at her end of the court.

The umpire intervened on the first two, but at the third, when Pavlyuchenkova stopped as the ball was clearly out, the umpire halted play. He then spent several minutes on his court-side phone, after which he instructed the players to replay the point. This was an incomprehensible decision, and particularly at a crucial point in the match.

Pavlyuchenkova was serving at four games all in the first set, and the game was on her advantage, thus her opponent’s ball going long meant she had won the game. No question, as the ball was clearly out, and right under the nose of the chair umpire. Pavlyuchenkova was justifiably put out and went on to lose the replayed point, and with it her serve.

A statement issued by the AELTC, defending the decision to replay the point, said: ‘The electronic line-calling system was unfortunately unable to track the last point’ – so it needed to be replayed!

Why must eye-witness, common sense and fairness, as applied by humans, have to be overridden by technology, even when faulty? The wider implications of this trend of passive behaviour by officials, when called upon to fulfil their primary function, needs to be highlighted.

Plain-speaking Australian tennis commentator and former Wimbledon champion, Pat Cash, called the decision “ridiculous” and “mind-boggling”. He said the ball was not marginally long, but a good four inches out, and suggested that if umpires did not have the capacity to take the initiative and call the game when technology fails, then they had no purpose.

Happily, Pavlyuchenkova went on to win the match despite, as Pat Cash put it: “Computer says no.” He must have seen the front page of The Light recently.

The next step in human consciousness

by RICHARD HOUSE

Author revisits her groundbreaking book on victimhood

A 1990s psychology book – well ahead of its time when it challenged ‘victimhood’ attitudes – has been updated by the author for today’s world.

Jill Hall, a psychotherapy practitioner for nearly 50 years, has republished the book as The Reluctant Adult – Revisited.

First printed in 1993, it is even more relevant today as it explores how to move beyond victimhood into a state of adult freedom.

Why is it that a sense of freedom and wellbeing is not a more natural human state? Perhaps we are still hampered by an outdated Newtonian psychology which underpins the belief that something, or somebody, caused us to be the way we are.

Once trapped in an endless chain of blaming, woundedness and guilt, victimhood prevails, and adulthood then eludes us.

There must surely be vital aspects of the human psyche which most of us have not, as yet, brought into play. In relinquishing our present framework of thought, we

Topics addressed in the book

- Why is ‘victimhood’ so deeply entrenched in the human psyche?
- How does victimhood affect us, from the level of individual relationships to that of international geopolitics?
- What can we do to transcend the Victimhood Archetype and so take our next evolutionary leap in human consciousness?

can then be reconciled, with freedom and responsibility becoming an achievable possibility. Yet letting go is precisely what we fear most.

The Reluctant Adult – Revisited is an invitation to embrace our full adulthood.

The new edition contains extra material, including a new foreword and preface, an appendix that includes a long section about covid in relation to victimhood, and a detailed index.

Once trapped in an endless chain of blaming, woundedness and guilt, victimhood prevails, and adulthood then eludes us

This book is claimed to be of profound evolutionary importance, and a must-read for anyone with a spiritual orientation/worldview, or who has an interest in personal, psychological and spiritual development.

Jill said: “I am thrilled that the ideas in my book are being re-affirmed in this new edition. If anything, the message the book contains is even more relevant today than when I first wrote the book in the early 1990s.

“We urgently need an evolutionary leap in human consciousness, and addressing the challenges in this book are a necessary condition for such a shift to occur.”

Endorsements for the book include:

- ‘It is a real thrill to find the spiritual aspect of holism expressed with such vision and authority’ – Sir George Trevelyan
- ‘A powerful rejection of victimhood and a defence of our fullest humanity. For those who want to understand how society has adopted a diminished idea of human being, this book is essential reading’ – Dennis Hayes, Emeritus Professor of Education
- ‘The impact of this book has changed my way of thinking about the world’ – Robin Shohet, author and psychotherapist

Jill has lived in Norwich and practised as a therapist and group facilitator for nearly 50 years. She moved to London from South Africa in her late teens to train at the Central School of Speech and Drama, spent her 20s as an actress, her 30s as a mother and philosophy student, and subsequently worked as an individual and group psychotherapist. She has lectured extensively to professional bodies and universities about the ideas in The Reluctant Adult.

Memory hole for a Rothschild?

Let's consider the motives for climate alarmism

by NIALL McCRAE

IT is believed by some to have been the most significant event in the life of Edmund de Rothschild.

And yet a speech – reportedly given by the elite-level financier to launch the worldwide campaign against carbon dioxide – is missing from his memoirs.

Researchers will now find that mentions of his ‘eloquent’ appeal for action – allegedly given at the Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro in 1992 – appear to have disappeared from YouTube and been ‘memory-holed’ by Google.

De Rothschild, who died in 2009 at the age of 93, is unusual amongst his other family members in having an autobiography published (A Gilt-Edged Life, 1998).

He presents himself in the book as a sophisticated English gentleman with a passion for horticulture – but was there more to this high-profile member of a prominent banking dynasty?

In 1975, when De Rothschild retired from the NM Rothschild bank, he attended a conference of the World Wilderness Leadership, held in conjunction with the United Nations, in Colorado.

He wrote: “I have also been interested in wider environmental problems, in particular pollution control.” Otherwise, his involvement in the climate crisis campaign is absent from the book. Isn’t that strange for an environmentalist?

The final chapter (‘Home Stretch’) portrays him as retiring to his home and garden, occasionally attending commemorations.

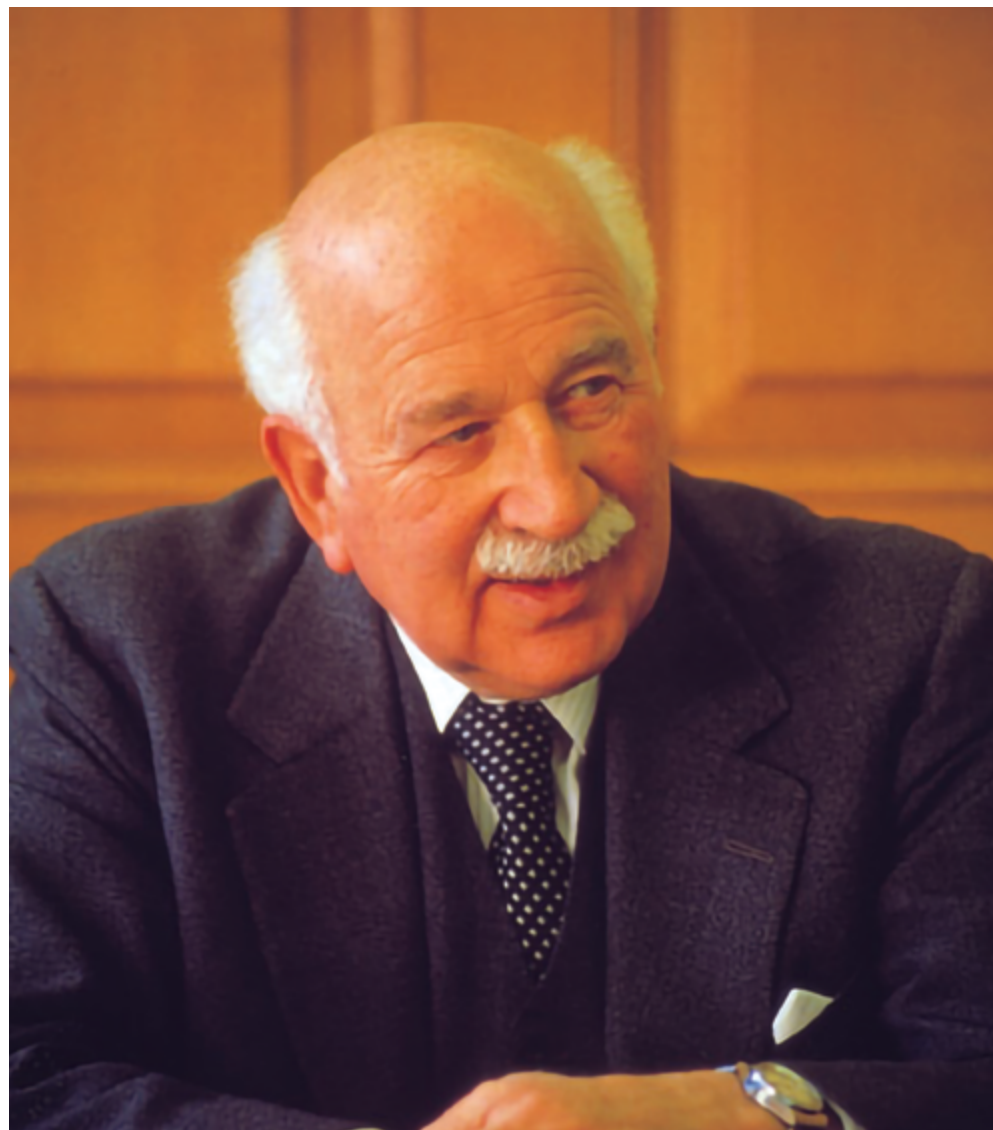

But it is believed by some that he made the most impact on the global stage during his seventies and eighties.

At the fourth World Wilderness Congress in 1987, it is claimed he asserted that carbon dioxide was the cause of global warming, and that massive funds would be needed to reduce the effects. It is also claimed that he helped found the World Conservation Bank and that he did so for the purposes of tackling global warming.

Money from the International Monetary Fund would be loaned to the poorest countries, under guarantee of Western governments.

The bank would then designate wilderness areas with mineral riches as security for the loans, which some say enabled land grabs when those poor countries defaulted on payments.

It is claimed De Rothschild succeeded in getting this huge financial and territorial scheme adopted as international policy through his acquaintance with Maurice Strong – a founding figure of climate catastrophism – at the UN Conference on Environment and Development (the 1992 Earth Summit).

Edmund de Rothschild

It is understood that an environmental businessman, George Hunt – who was shocked to see the summit dominated by global banking billionaires – published De Rothschild’s speech.

De Rothschild’s acquaintance, Strong, is said to have introduced the then 76-year-old banker at the Earth Summit, saying: “There is no better person to lead us in this dialogue, between growth and development forces on the one hand and conservation and ecology on the other, than Mr Edmund de Rothschild.

“I have known him for many years, as one of the great financial/industrial leaders of our planet...so there is no better person. He epitomises in his own life that positive synthesis between environment and conservation on the one hand, and economics on the other. And I’m just delighted to have this opportunity to introduce to you Edmund de Rothschild.”

The speech that followed was said to be eloquent, but demanding of the world’s political leaders in attendance. And there were ludicrous ideas put forward, such as using carbon dioxide for dry ice to keep the North and South Poles frozen. More importantly, it is claimed De Rothschild told the gathered national leaders that they would be forever cursed if they failed to act – and that meant approving the World Conservation Bank.

From then onwards, democratic governments would be superseded by international agreements.

Now the globalists – under the banner of fighting man-made climate change – are reorganising agriculture, business and society at a grand scale as part of a new world order that has been planned for decades.

According to his autobiography, De Rothschild, in 1994, attended the 250th anniversary of the birth of his great-great-grandfather Mayer Amschel Rothschild, the Frankfurt banker and father of Nathan Mayer Rothschild and his four brothers.

Frankfurt’s city authorities decided that to mark the anniversary, they would like to honour the Rothschilds, and consequently nearly a hundred members of the family assembled there.

Interestingly, the city was not only the birthplace of a global banking dynasty, but also of radical social thinking at the Frankfurt School.

Consider neo-Marxist professor Noam Chomsky’s book Who Rules the World? (2016). Endorsed on the cover as ‘the world’s greatest public intellectual’ (Guardian), Chomsky is deemed an authority on how the world is really run, and by whom.

So how many index entries would you expect for the following names: BlackRock and Vanguard; George Soros; Klaus Schwab and the World Economic Forum; Rockefeller and Rothschild bankers?

The answer is Net Zero!

So who does Chomsky believe holds the reins of power? He justifiably points his finger at greedy corporate capitalism and the U.S. government for abuses at home and abroad, while also criticising far-right populists.

But he fails to see the climate crisis narrative as a tool that is being used to enable the massive redistribution of wealth from the lower and middle classes to the predatory elite.

It appears that De Rothschild’s legacy could well be the monetising and rationing of every resource on Earth, from fuel to water.

Why would Chomsky overlook the Rothschilds and Rockefellers? Perhaps it was a publisher’s edit. Note, however, that Chomsky urged incarceration of anyone refusing the covid-19 vaccine.

Perhaps the reason for YouTube censorship, De Rothschild’s apparent modesty in his autobiography, and Chomsky missing the elephant in the room, is that the powers-that-be don’t want us knowing too much.

If so, then it is not only contrary opinions and truths that are suppressed, but also the utterances of powerful people, especially so if they reveal any questionable motives for climate alarmism.

Ancient laws define us as paupers

Administrators are bound by statute, not conscience

by TOM THOMSON

MANY of us consider parish councils to be sleepy administrative bodies – issuing bin schedules, managing allotments, and signing off on minor planning applications.

But hidden beneath the surface is a legacy that stretches back centuries, one rooted in the Elizabethan Poor Laws, where parishes wielded legal power over the lives of the poor, the sick, and the dependent. That power has never truly ended. It has simply switched lanes and changed names.

Today, local and parish councils continue to exercise powers eerily similar to their 17th-century predecessors: control over public records, taxation, licensing, and the presumption that individuals are wards – not sovereign, living men and women, but administrable entities under the care of the state.

By investigating the historical framework of parish control, we can show that the registration of birth – originally a church function – had become the commercial foundation for civil identity.

This identity, crafted without full disclosure, presumed the living man or woman to be a dependent or pauper of the parish. That assumption has been built into modern governance.

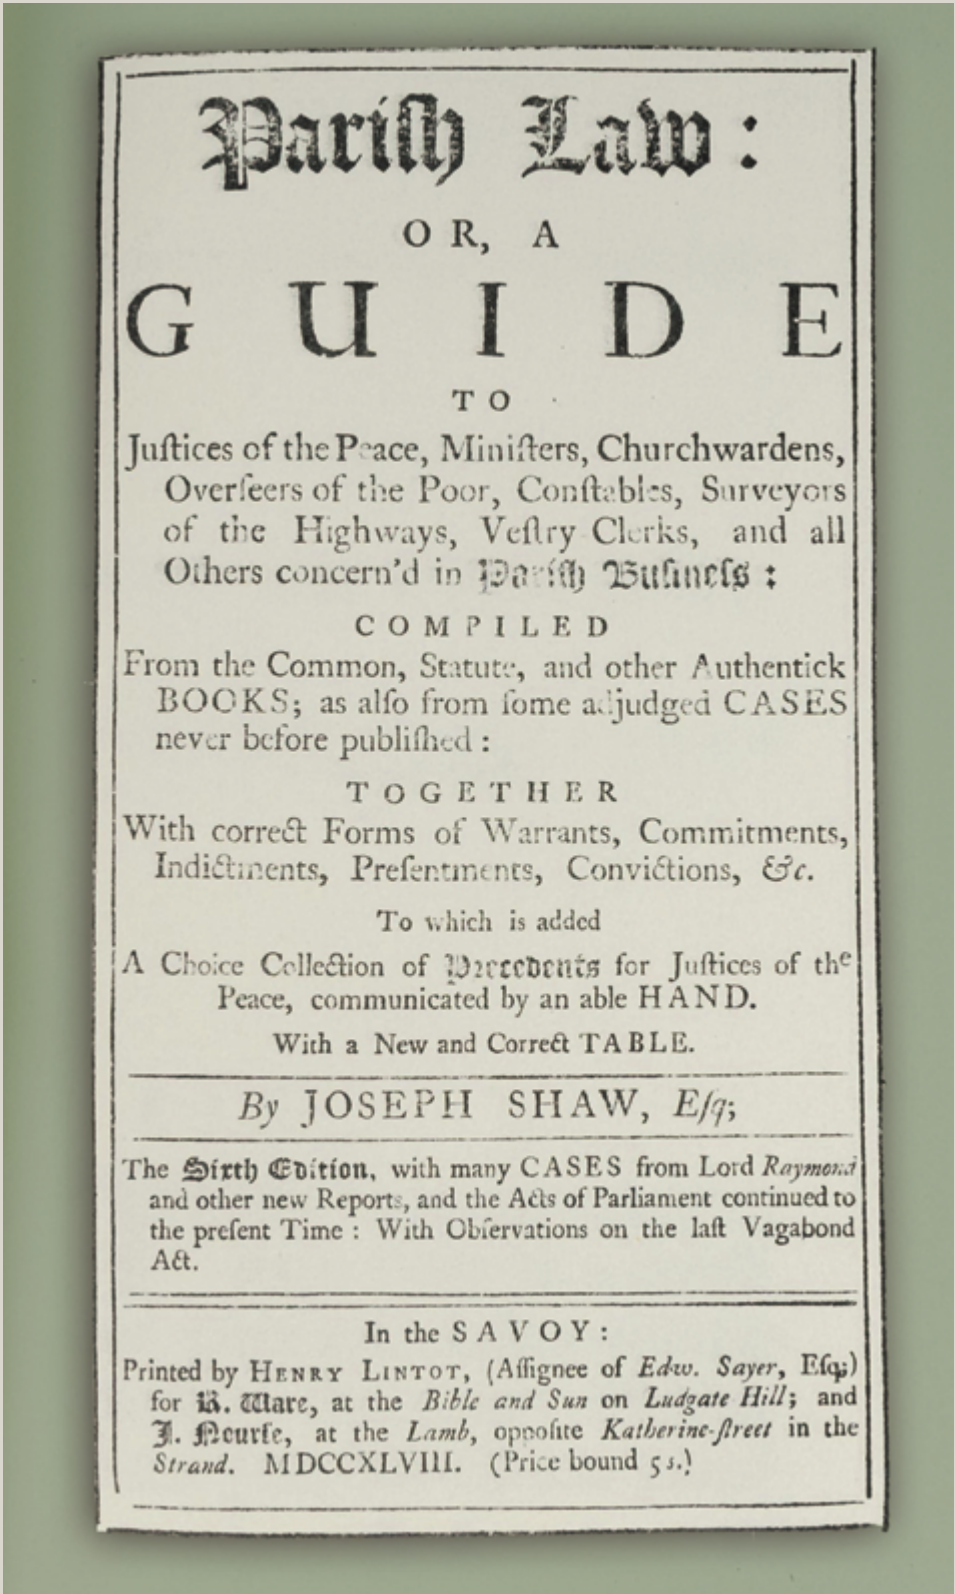

In response, some people have initiated lawful corrections. Using a blend of common law, equity, General Data Protection Regulations (GDPR), and spiritual foundation, they have begun issuing notices:

- to the General Register Office, declaring their standing as executors and beneficiaries of their respective estates.
- to local councils, rebutting any presumption of wardship.
- to public officers, requiring erasure of false records and recognition of lawful capacity.

This is not rebellion – it is remedy.

The Poor Relief Act 1601, the Workhouse Test Act 1723, and the Local Government Act 1894 laid down a framework where those needing ‘relief’ became legal dependents of the parish. Councils, as the successors to parish vestries, retained those powers.

While the buildings and uniforms have changed, the assumption remains that if you do not declare yourself alive and competent, you are presumed to be a dependent.

This is where GDPR becomes a powerful tool – not merely for privacy, but as a lawful mechanism to demand correction, erase false assumptions, and assert one’s true standing.

At stake is more than legal status – it is spiritual and practical autonomy. Remaining silent allows councils and state bodies to assume jurisdiction over one’s affairs, property, and choices.

Yet it is not only councils that perpetuate this silent presumption. Many of today’s civil and administrative courts operate without honour, assuming jurisdiction through unspoken contract or presumption of incompetence.

These courts seldom recognise the lawful status of the living man unless it is asserted with precision and consistency. Rather than act in equity or uphold natural justice, they often prioritise procedure over substance, acting in the interest of state or corporate policy, not lawful remedy.

Even more concerning is the quiet erosion of the right to trial by jury. Once a cornerstone of common law, this right is being phased out in favour of judge-only hearings in administrative and civil matters.

Where once justice was safeguarded by twelve peers of the land, it is now often handed down by one officer of the system – bound by statute, not conscience. This undermines the very principle of justice as a shared, communal responsibility.

Thus, remedy begins not in the courtroom – but in notice, standing, and private administration. The courts may not offer the justice one expects, but the law itself – natural and divine – remains intact for those who stand in it.

This struggle is not merely legal – it is spiritual. As the Geneva Bible (1587) states: ‘For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, and against the worldly governors, the princes of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness, which are in the high places.’ (Ephesians 6:12)

These ‘princes of darkness’ are not metaphorical – they operate through institutions, offices, and high places of worldly governance. The verse directly identifies that the powers who rule over the systems of this world – the governors, administrators, and principalities – are aligned with spiritual wickedness. The structure is not merely flawed, it is consciously maintained by those aligned with darkness.

The modern administrative system is not merely misguided, it is governed by forces that actively oppose light and truth. The task is not to rage against flesh, but to stand in truth, light, and honour against the unseen engines of presumption and control.

The process of lawful correction is replicable. It involves no court appearances, no defiance – only clear notice, lawful record-keeping, and honourable engagement.

As the maxim goes: ‘He who does not assert his rights has none.’

This is not a theory. This is history. It is also a path forward.

For those willing to take responsibility for their estate and rebut public presumption, the tools are already available. What remains is awareness – and the courage to act.

The councils still carry the legacy of the parishes. But the people no longer need to carry the burden of the pauper.

The geo-engineered transhuman

Review of book on the genetic gameplan by Elana Freeland

by SHANE FUDGE

THERE is a growing realisation among the general public that weather manipulation is a real phenomenon.

The practice of geo-engineering has even begun to appear regularly in the mainstream media – albeit via a narrative justifying and endorsing the UK Government’s plans to ‘dim the sun’.

Author and activist, Elana Freeland, argues that this kind of activity is not for our benefit and has been going on for far longer than headlines lead us to believe. Each of her four extensively researched books since 2014 has documented what she believes the military-industrial complex has been up to above our heads – primarily through the Secret Space Programme – in the decades leading up to 2020.

Her latest book, The Geo-engineered Transhuman, outlines the latest phase of what she believes to be the scientific ambition of the ‘full-spectrum dominance’ of planet Earth.

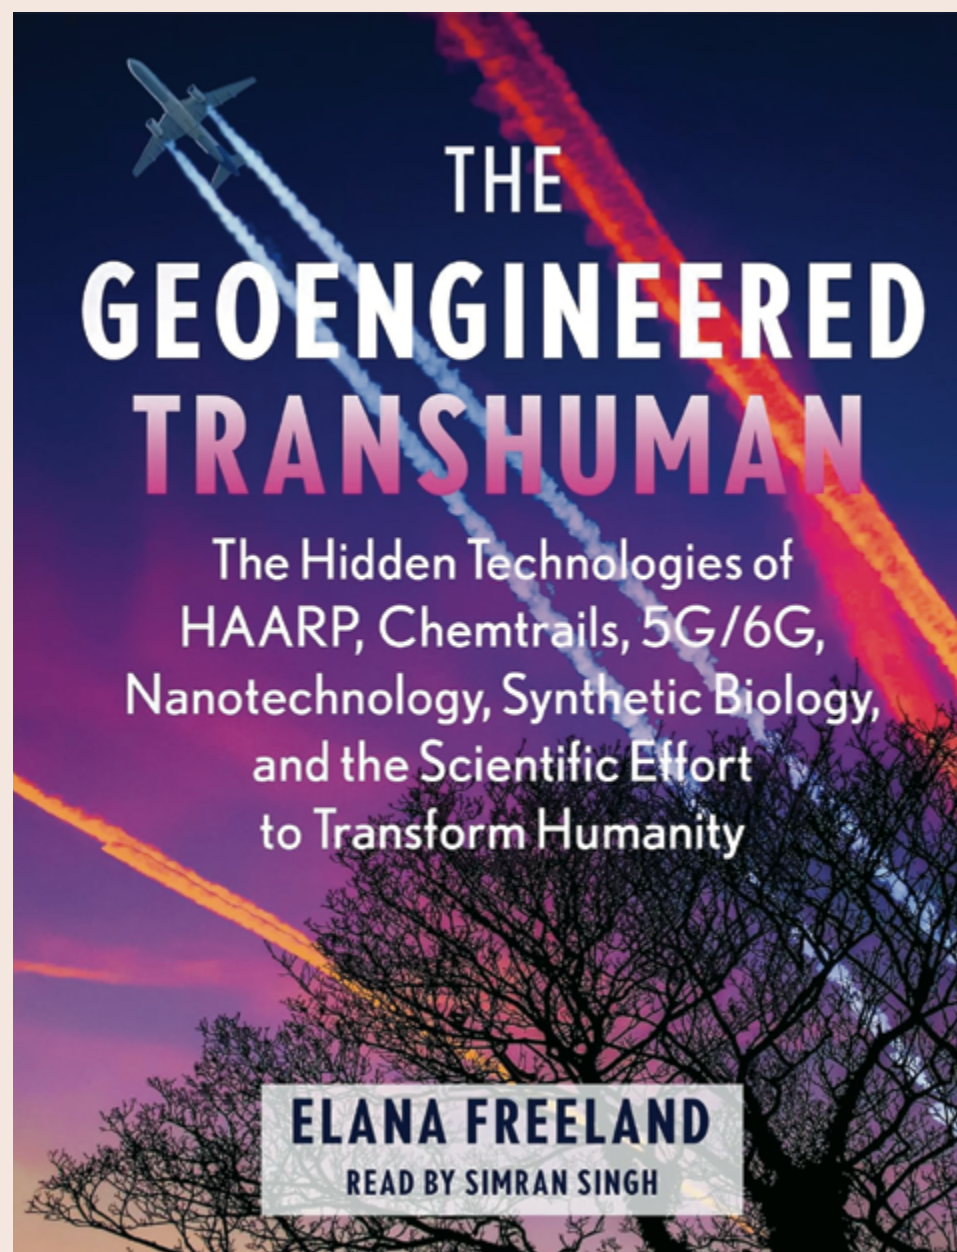

She claims that control over the ionosphere, 50 to 600 miles above the Earth, was accomplished by 2013 after decades of DARPA (the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency in the U.S.) experimentation and billions of taxpayer dollars funded research.

She claims this research has allowed for the transforming of our natural environment into a fully wireless, ionised atmosphere – becoming an active electrified antenna and semiconductor.

And with HAARP [the High-frequency Active Auroral Research Project], other strategically placed smaller and mobile ionospheric heaters, and the ‘smart grid’, our environment now consists of thousands of miles of artificially sustained plasma cloud-cover created from jet-delivered nano chemicals stimulated by pulsed high-frequency beams.

The rollout of these full-spectrum assaults – all under the political veneer of ‘man-made climate change’ – now includes the ongoing ‘gridding of the atmosphere’ which is said to have begun with Project Cloverleaf’s increasing influence on cyclone/tornado activity.

It is also claimed that there is the aerial dispersal by aircraft or drones of aluminum and coal ash. Not only does this activity affect the physical environment, but we all allegedly breathe in these experimental synthetic payloads, radioactive particulates, nanobots and chemicals chosen specifically to both control and weaken the global population.

Elana Freeland’s new book - The Geoengineered Transhuman

This geoengineering activity also ends up in our soil, vegetation, oceans, weather, food, and water, begging the question: who are the real architects behind the degradation of our planet?

Freeland argues that the 2020 ‘pandemic’ signaled a paradigmatic shift in the genetic assault on humankind not by means of a ‘virus’ but by means of an operating system delivered into the human body via covid shots, then activated by 5G/6G electromagnetic transmissions via the Internet of Bodies, microwave masts and Starlink satellites that were first launched in 2019.

Between the conductive nanometals and the microprocessors, much of humankind is increasingly weakened and controlled by an AI infrastructure which has now assumed a global range, she claims.

The Geoengineered Transhuman connects what is being geoengineered into the environment with what is now in our blood and tissues.

In the book, Freeland outlines the research into human blood being done by independent scientist Clifford Carnicom and medical doctors Ana Mihalcea (U.S.) and David Nixon (Australia) and others.

By means of extraordinary microscopes utilized in live blood analysis (LBA), it has become clear to them that human blood is being changed by both geoengineering and injecting nanotechnology/synthetic biology into the body, where it then self-assembles and self-replicates over time.

The ‘pandemic’ provided the justification for billions of injections that then enabled synthetic biology experimentation.

In the name of convenience and comfort, electrical devices are not only proliferating but working against us, Freeland suggests. Mobile phones and other Internet of Things devices create electromagnetic fields that entrap us in the controlling matrix that Freeland refers to as the Space Fence.

We have only to look at the alarming rise in death and illness over the last five years to grasp the power of weaponising ‘dual use’ (civilian and military) electromagnetic fields. The rapid increase in global deaths, fast-acting ‘turbo’ cancers, autoimmune symptoms, and the myriad of other health issues clearly point to a sinister agenda that is far beyond mere corporate greed.

Freeland poses the question: how do we counter an agenda determined to turn molecular biology into digital biology, and turn people into synthetic transhuman beings?

First, we must wake up as many people as possible to the fact that geoengineering is one of the sciences bent on replacing the natural with the synthetic. There will be no more need for social engineering when this is all in place, Freeland warns.

The orchestrated transformation of humanity through a state-of-the-art synthesis of chemistry, electromagnetism, nanotechnology and synthetic biology will lead us into a post-human virtual metaverse, or as Rudolf Steiner referred to it, the ‘eighth sphere’.

This is the endgame that is now worryingly within the grasp of the technocratic elite and their nefarious supporting cast.

This ‘breakaway civilisation’ agenda has never really been hidden. Whilst hiding behind the colloquial narrative of climate change, global warming, carbon control, and sustainable development, the U.S. military (and other deep state operatives around the globe) have been openly boasting for almost 30 years that they will ‘own the weather’.

So whilst politicians, technocrats, the legacy media, and environmental lobbyists continue to gaslight and guilt-trip us regarding man-made climate change, the real changes in our environment have largely come about as the result of the high-level genetic experimentation documented in The Geoengineered Transhuman.

Freeland is presently writing a companion volume about synthetic biology with the working title Remaining Human.

Perfect gift to set a friend on an awakening journey

by MATTHEW WRAY

RACHEL Mathews has hung up her hat educating councils on the truth of the Net Zero agenda, now she's moved her focus onto those who are beginning to question everything.

She has written a 'pink pill' book which charts her waking up journey, the behind-the-scenes of Colchester Council Watch and what really happened when they pushed back against the council's Net Zero plans.

As well as being educational, the book is humorous and fast-paced. The eBook can be downloaded from her website as a 'pay what you want' (free if you like) and there's an audiobook version too. It's the perfect gift to give to family and friends to help them on their awakening journey. Here's an excerpt from her new book Misadventures of an Accidental Activist:

Something is Definitely Not Right

You're likely feeling it too. Even if not consciously, I'd put money on somewhere inside you there's a nagging feeling of discomfort that all is not well in the world.

Bizarre decisions from the government, appearing hell-bent on destroying life as we know it. Everything from farming and education, to business and many more seemingly insane actions; and it is all insane, but then at the same time, if you dig deep enough, it does all make complete sense.

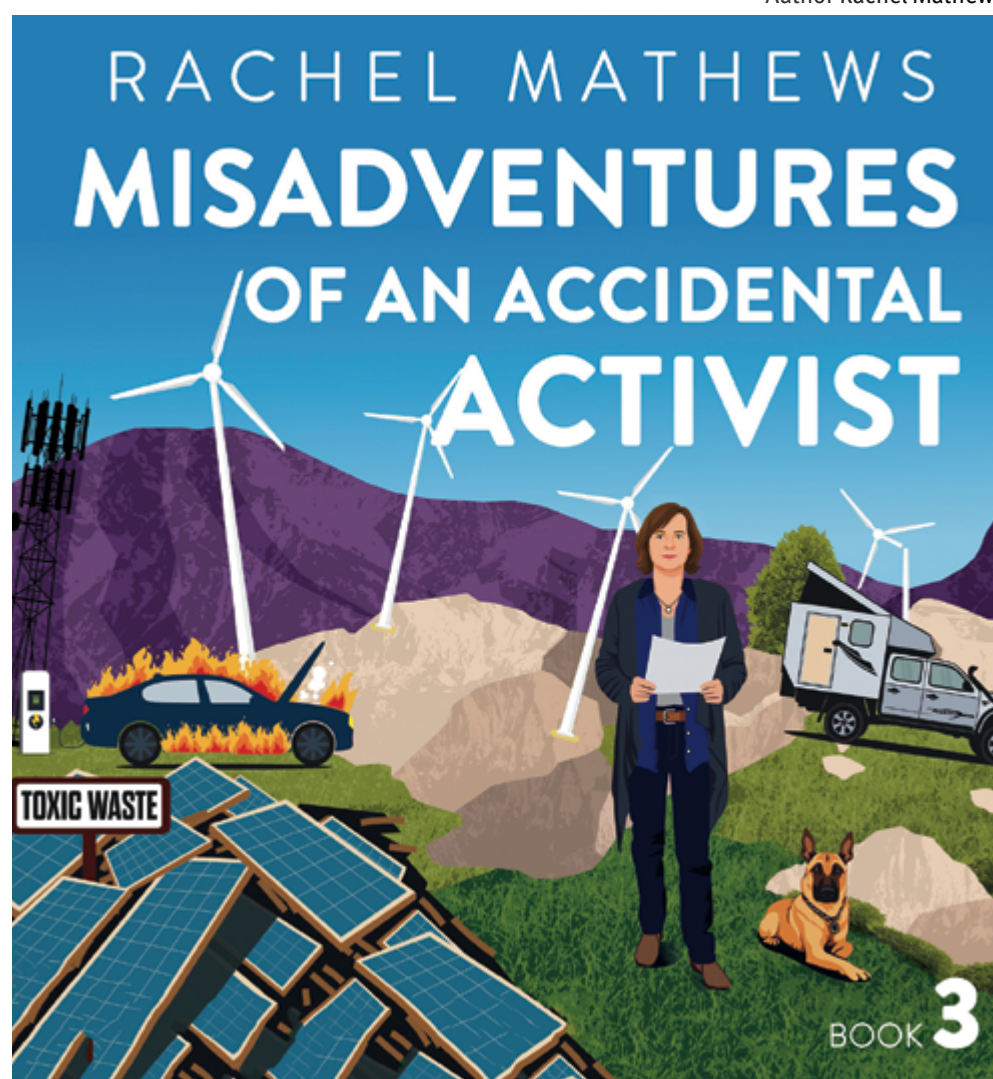

I drew the conclusion that something definitely wasn't right about three weeks into the first lockdown, though with little clue as to just how much. At the time, I had stranded myself in southern Spain. I'd sent my passport back to the UK in February with friends, to be renewed. In March, another friend was due to bring it back after she visited family in England. You can probably guess how well that idea panned out.

With her trip cancelled and my new passport now posted, but marooned in Madrid airport for six weeks, I couldn't go anywhere. By the time I did get my hands on my passport, there were no flights. I was stuck in Spain whether I liked it or not.

They didn't mess about with lockdown in Spain. No one was allowed out to even exercise for nearly three months, let alone live any sort of remotely normal life. Armed police and the army were on the streets, with police patrols around urbanisations every fifteen minutes to make sure no one was leaving their homes. In addition, there were patrol boats, drones and helicopters making sure no one was on the beaches.

Author Rachel Mathews

People seen out were stopped, and bags were searched, to make sure they were only out for essentials, like a full food shop or a doctor visit. Masses of fines were issued and millions of euros made in a matter of days. Foreigners appeared to be a particular target for the authorities – a great way to find out who had overstayed their welcome – of which, I was one.

People reported their neighbours to the police if they saw anyone doing anything or going anywhere which was not allowed. The carefree and rebellious Spanish spirit I'd warmed to so much, vanished overnight.

I diligently complied with all the rules and regulations for the first three weeks, all the while the feeling that something wasn't right gnawed away at me. It didn't make sense to stay inside when fresh air, exercise and sunshine are so vital for health.

The rules in Spain were insane. If two people took a car journey, one had to sit in the back, and both had to wear masks, even if they were married and slept in the same bed! When they finally did let us out to exercise after ten weeks of confinement, we had an hour slot allocated dependent on age. This also changed every couple of weeks, really messing with our heads and ability to keep track of the new rules.

After three weeks of solitary confinement I started muttering on Facebook. Two things happened as a result. A barrage of abuse from the hardliners and some private messages telling me to ditch Facebook and to come over to Telegram or Signal. I'd not heard of either of them and didn't particularly want to be on different platforms. But the more I muttered, the more abuse I received.

Two of the three people who reached out to me had grown up in Eastern bloc countries, and immediately knew government propaganda when they saw it.

Research, Research, Research

My move over to the new social media platforms instigated an intense amount of research for sixteen hours a day, seven days a week. I was reading things on the new platforms that under normal circumstances I would have rolled my eyes at and moved on. But nothing that was going on was normal, and I had that prickle at the back of my neck telling me to investigate.

My internal response at that time, to the articles I was reading was, 'that can't possibly be true' and I'd do all I could to prove the article wrong. I went on to government websites to read original documents to see if the authors of the articles had put their own spin on things. I didn't take anyone's word for anything, I had to see it for myself. I dug down into the finances of the foundations mentioned, which belonged to influential billionaires, and I followed the money. It was eye-opening stuff.

Little did I know at the time how much my life and world view would change as a result of my researching. What came next was the mother of all plot twists, something I could never have seen coming in a million years...

Bill Gates covid court case arrest

by HENRY WIDDAS

Dutch lawyer in vaccine harm lawsuit detained ahead of first hearing

THE lead prosecution lawyer in a court case accusing vaccines czar, Bill Gates, of engineering mass deception over covid, has been detained in a maximum security prison in Holland.

Alternative news site, Europe Reloaded, reported that Arno van Kessel was arrested at his home by armed officers before being detained for a time period that will last for at least 90 days.

Ido Dijkstra, reporting for Dutch newspaper De Andere Krant, said the Public Prosecution Service continued to regard the lawyer as a 'suspect in an investigation into a criminal network' – for the time being without providing any evidence.

Dutch police issued a statement via the website politie.nl linking Van Kessel to the 'criminal network'.

And according to a press release prepared by the prosecution service, eight people were arrested that morning who 'adhere to anti-institutional ideology and may have the intention to use violence'.

Defenders of the lawyer claim he is a non-violent Christian man.

Online news site, The Exposé, reported that Van Kessel was blindfolded by a team of semi-military police during the arrest and that he remained in the Netherlands' highest security prison, far away from his family.

Despite his arrest, it is understood the court case against Gates and others began last month and a judgement was expected by August 20 at the latest.

Proceedings against Gates and former prime minister of the Netherlands, Mark Rutte, along with 15 others, began in 2023 and were led by Dutch lawyers, Van Kessel and Peter Stassen, representing seven claimants who alleged harm from covid injections.

Top: Arrested lawyer Arno van Kessel. Bottom: Bill Gates

Independent researcher, Penny Maries, reported that Gates did not appear before the Leeuwarden District Court on September 18 last year, but was represented by a lawyer from Pels Rijcken who stated a Dutch judge was not competent to judge him because Gates was an American citizen.

But in the following month, it was reported a judge had ruled that the Dutch courts did have jurisdiction. And in June this year, the North Netherlands District Court in Leeuwarden announced that the first substantive hearing of the case was scheduled for July 9.

Speaking after this first hearing, Dutch independent media outlet Pinch of Soot stated: "If Van Kessel's arrest was meant to intimidate Stassen, it did the opposite. As if he felt he had nothing left to lose, Stassen did all but mince his words, he named the defendants' alleged crimes – biowarfare, genocide, mass murder, deceit and assault."

It was reported that Stassen concluded his submission to a judge at the preliminary hearing at the North Netherlands District Court with: "If you reject this request [for a trial], the same blood sticking to the defendants' hands will stick to yours. This case deserves a public debate at the highest instance: the courtroom. I wish you much wisdom."

During the hearing, it is understood that Stassen requested the court heard witness statements from financial expert, Catherine Austin Fitts, medical expert, Mike Yeadon, and Sasha Latypova, a professional in healthcare business and entrepreneurship, among others, as requested by his clients, who alleged being harmed by the covid-19 injections.

This request was contested by, in total, eight lawyers, representing Gates, Rutte, chief editors in Dutch media, and a range of high-ranking Dutch officials and politicians.

Stassen is reported to have said in court: "None of the defendants' lawyers have responded to the content of my plea. They foolishly repeat the official narrative...The Dutch State's lawyer even has the nerve to repeat 'safe and effective' here again, while facts and data have long since overtaken the official narrative."

Similarities with Reiner Fuellmich case?

Ido Dijkstra, in his report for De Andere Krant (which translates as The Other Newspaper), draws similarities between Arno van Kessel's arrest and the prosecution of German lawyer, Reiner Fuellmich, who was also attempting to hold world leaders to account over covid protocols.

Fuellmich was convicted of embezzlement last year and was jailed for three years and nine months.

His defenders claim his incarceration followed a malicious prosecution set up to derail an inquiry into the alleged pandemic by Fuellmich's group, the Corona Investigative Committee.

As reported in The Light last September, the 67-year-old's defence team claimed ahead of his conviction that they were not provided with evidence of new charges brought against him and were denied the right to give oral evidence in court. It was claimed the ban violated the law of orality in German courts.

Stars aligning for World War Three

Technocracy will rise from ashes of massive conflict

by WILLIAM HAMMOND

IF history teaches us anything, it's that when the financial system nears collapse, war becomes the reset button of choice for the rulers.

This time, however, the stakes include not just territory or markets – but the future of democratic self-governance itself.

We are facing the possibility of another world war with global technocracy then being 'offered' as the solution.

There are several signs that reveal this trajectory for mankind:

- Most nations' governments and their citizens are swimming in unpayable debt. Global debt has passed $300 trillion.
- Our institutions are failing due to lack of money.
- Many banks are technically insolvent. The only thing preventing mass defaults is state backstopping and cheap liquidity.
- Rising bond yields means governments must pay more interest on their national debt, yet they have no plan to shrink deficits.
- The fractional reserve banking system, often referred to as a Ponzi scheme, is nearing the end of its life.
- Central banks have used quantitative easing (money printing) to delay collapse – not solve it.
- NATO expansion eastward towards Russia's doorstep, is creating a high-stakes powder keg.
- Talk of conscription in Germany, France, the Baltics, and the UK, plus increased spending on defence, are signals of long-term war planning.
- The Ukraine war and increasing China-Taiwan tensions suggest that the world is splitting again into opposing blocs – not unlike 1914 or 1938.

This is the classic pattern of a system entering its terminal phase and we have a 'Great Reset' to save us, which can be summed up as stakeholder capitalism.

This involves invested stakeholders such as corporate boards, industry leaders, NGOs, UN bodies and government representatives being invited to participate in round-table discussions to formulate policy.

It is an undemocratic approach with so-called experts claiming to speak for the environment and society while protecting their own interests.

The parallels between Stakeholder Capitalism and the Technocracy Inc.

The symbol for technocracy - a red/white ying yang - coming to a country near you very soon movement from the 1930s are clear.

During the financial depression of that time, a powerful, half-million strong movement led by engineer, Howard Scott, came to prominence, proposing that various experts in science, engineering and data analytics should govern in a resource-based system based on the unit cost of energy. In this system, there was no place for politicians, regarded by technocrats as unfit for purpose.

The result was an ideological clash and a war of words ensued. Politicians and traditional economists dismissed technocrats as utopian, anti-democratic, or even fascist in their top-down vision. Technocrats saw politics as a wasteful, corrupt game of rhetoric and vested interests – unfit for solving real problems in an industrial society.

The technocracy movement ended with internal disputes, poor leadership, and discovery of Howard Scott's lack of academic credentials. Nevertheless, the core ideas lived on.

While politicians still hold office today, many major decisions are heavily influenced (or effectively made) by unelected experts. International institutions call the tunes that nation states must dance to.

The World Economic Forum's Young Global Leaders' programme was established in 2004 to unite outstanding next-generation leaders from across the world. Many of the world's prime ministers also passed through to bring them on board with the new proposed system of technocratic governance – stakeholder capitalism.

The covid phenomenon acted as a catalyst for the acceleration of top-down control. WEF founder, Klaus Schwab, put it plainly: "The pandemic represents a rare but narrow window of opportunity to reflect, reimagine, and reset our world."

But which reset will we get? The one proposed by Klaus Schwab and the end of democracy, or a reset designed by the people for the people?

The answer will depend entirely on a critical mass of ordinary folk learning about the technocratic plan to subjugate humanity in a modern-day slave system – a hidden digital prison controlled by algorithms and artificial intelligence in which everything is connected to everything.

Historical studies on mass non-compliance show that when 3.5 per cent of a population refuses to comply with a bad law, this is sufficient to force a government to change course.

Patrick Wood, a leading expert on technocracy, gave a stark warning for the future of humanity if nothing is done.

He said: "If we do nothing, the great reset is gonna run over us like a steamroller on a hot pavement that's been laid down by a truck."

Wood was aware that globalist operatives had infiltrated and compromised all the major institutions including government, the judiciary, law enforcement, education, and healthcare. For this reason, he advised against relying solely on letters, petitions or electoral politics.

He said: "Now is the time for people to take to the streets. Not with weapons of destruction, not to harm anybody, but now is the time for citizens who understand what is going on to take to the streets and message other citizens, to bring them out of the fog of deception, and invite them to be in the street as well, and grow a movement that cannot be ignored."

In years past, many activists have urged patience: plant seeds, speak gently, avoid sounding 'alarmist'.

But the clock is ticking. The mechanisms for total control – digital ID systems, central bank digital currencies and stablecoins, AI surveillance – are already in development.

Will we allow for the decision on our future to be made for us? Or will we make it ourselves?

From paradise to prison

American ex-pat framed in a tropical nightmare

by DANIEL D. KAGE

Prisoner in Paradise blends true crime and supernatural horror—as idyllic island life turns into a fight for survival behind bars

KEN (surname withheld for fear of reprisals from the corrupt officials who extorted him) was a former music industry insider managing three Top Ten bands, then United Nations communications consultant in Africa and Asia, and then boutique hotel owner.

He never imagined that his tropical paradise existence would become a prison. But in 2021, his world collapsed when his girlfriend, Isabel, a secret drug dealer, and her crystal meth smoking brother, Louis, with ties to the island’s Narcotics Chief, framed him for trafficking and then threatened him with life imprisonment if he didn’t cough up $250,000.

‘One minute, I was living in paradise. The next, I was locked in a cell where the walls whispered curses,’ the author recalls in his gripping new memoir, Prisoner in Paradise.

What followed was five months of hell in a banana-republic jail – a surreal ordeal of corrupt trials, prison gangs, and eerie supernatural threats. Now, with Hollywood already circling the story, his memoir is poised to become the next true crime sensation.

His story begins like a dream: after years managing Billboard Top Ten bands from his offices in London and New York City, and after that, working on UN humanitarian projects in ten countries in Africa and six countries in Asia, he settles on a lush tropical island, running a boutique hotel. Then he meets Isabel.

‘She was local, charming, beautiful, but hiding a double life,’ he writes.

When undercover police stormed her car one hot Friday night, they found a kilo of weed, and Ken sitting in the passenger seat next to her. The Narcotics Chief, Rafe, assigned them his old school buddy, Xavier, as their lawyer, who proceeded to demand $250,000 or simply to ‘hand over your hotel to Rafe’s nephew because he works in hospitality too.’

‘The trial was a Zoom farce due to covid restrictions. My lawyer bled me like a turnip, asking me practically every week for money, but never delivering on what he was promising me – house arrest in a nice beach hotel, no deportation, no conviction, etc. And the inmates? They knew I was innocent—but nobody cared.’

The prison was no ordinary jail. It was a place where:

- Inmates sang Bob Marley between Fight Club-style brawls.
- Covid lockdowns turned cells into pressure cookers.
- Black magic curses – red threads, moving shadows, black seeds – left men terrified.

Isabel’s family practised ‘the old ways’. Her mother was a deep jungle princess, who used to get carried around by four scantily-clad warriors, supporting her throne on two wooden poles.

At 62 years old, he fought back with yoga, dark humour, and a faked heart attack to get medical care and ended up spending five weeks of his five months of incarceration in hospital. It was there where he fell in love with the nurse who came up with a watertight escape plan for him.

Now free, he is channelling his ordeal into advocacy:

Why Ken’s story grips

- 1. True Crime meets Supernatural Horror
– Midnight Express meets The Sixth Sense. A corrupt system and eerie folklore collide.
- 2. A Hero Unlike Any Other
– not a hardened criminal, but a UN consultant and music veteran trapped in a Kafkaesque nightmare.
- 3. Hollywood Can’t Resist
– A major U.S. podcast production company whose clients include Netflix/HBO/Disney wants to make an 8-episode series.
– An Oscar-nominated producer calls it ‘One Flew Over the Cuckoo’s Nest meets Midnight Express meets Papillon’ and says if the podcast is successful, he’ll make a film of it.
– A scriptwriter with two Netflix global hits wants to write the screenplay.

- Exposing corrupt judicial systems that target expats.
- Warning travellers of hidden dangers in ‘paradise’.
- Turning his story into a movement—with a memoir, true crime podcast, and film.

This isn’t just Ken’s story. It’s about how easily any of us could be next.

Ken plans to self-publish when the podcast and film are released.

This story is more than a memoir—it’s a cautionary tale and a battle cry.

Prisoner in Paradise doesn’t just recount a crime – it immerses readers in a world where justice is an illusion, survival is an art, and the supernatural might be real.

Gaza spearhead against tyranny

by SERENA WYLDE

Everyone must face up to battle against genocide

THE Palestinians' struggle for survival is at the forefront of the fight against the tyranny encircling us, but they are in the trenches suffering monumental losses.

It is a battle we cannot afford to lose, because the energy of zionism knows no limits. Palestine is where we must turn the tables, because this is not a religious conflict - it is a testing-ground, not only of weaponry and surveillance techniques, but of how far barbarism and depravity can go to destroy humanity while the world looks on without halting or punishing it.

Like a volcano erupting, its smouldering lava is cascading down for all to see, exposing the hypocrisy of politicians and the complacency of those who believe non-engagement means it will not affect them. One might say we are being presented with an opportunity to finally break the ring of elite corruption and impunity. Certainly every citizen is being presented with a choice as to which course they take, as it becomes evident we are living in a terrorist state that arbitrarily arrests its citizens.

Marianne Sorrell, a retired teacher aged 80, was arrested in Cardiff on July 12 for holding a placard at a pro-Palestine rally, together with a friend, Trisha Fine, 75, also a retired teacher, and eleven other people. Both women were held for 27 hours, during which time Sorrell was refused access to the antibiotics she was taking and the police failed to call her husband to inform him of her arrest. Both women have been bailed until October. They are forbidden from contacting one another and from spending any nights away from home. Sorrell said officers broke into her house via the back door. Neighbours told her there were about ten officers who spent three hours going through her property. A friend who came to feed the cats saw them poking long cotton buds into her jars of dried food. The unjustifiable violation of her home is exactly how terrorist states, in which safeguards and rights have ceased to exist, operate. Although traumatised and made sick by the experience, Sorrell remains defiant in her solidarity with the people who, she says, "have been persecuted now for almost my entire lifetime." Many other elderly citizens have been arrested across the country for expressing similar anti-genocide views.

In a symbolic act of defiance, orthodox Jews set fire to the Israeli flag

To understand the nature of zionism, it is important to hear from Jewish anti-zionists, who are also under relentless attack from the network of oppressors that knows no bounds nor observes any rules.

Prof. David Klein is Professor Emeritus of Mathematics at California State University Northridge, and was interviewed on July 18 by independent journalist Rick Sterling as part of a series of interviews with anti-zionist Jewish Americans.

Klein explains that his realisation that Israel was a settler-colonial state engaged in much the same practices as the United States perpetrated on the Native Americans, came with the 'Cast Lead' assault on Gaza by Israel in 2009. Journalist, Avihai Stollar, penned an article on that assault with the heading: 'The firepower, scale of destruction, and numbers of Palestinians killed during Operation Cast Lead were unprecedented in the brutal history of the conflict. Since then, the tactics used have become part of the IDF's arsenal in its wars on Gaza.'

Klein became an activist and the faculty adviser for Students for Justice in Palestine. He also created a webpage, a Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions resource, and organised lectures by high profile speakers such as Ilan Pappé and Norman Finkelstein.

Hundreds of calls to his university president demanded he be fired. He was also subjected to numerous threats of violence, and threats were made to his university administration of withholding financial contributions. An Israeli-supported law firm pressured Kamala Harris, while Attorney General, to prosecute him. But, he says, at that time they were just getting warmed up on people like him. Now they've really sharpened their knives and the persecution is getting progressively worse. Students, teachers and professors are facing frivolous lawsuits, students are being expelled, and faculty members are losing their jobs. Moreover, both are facing arrests and deportations for opposing genocide. "Zionist students and outside advocates of genocide claim to feel unsafe because of demonstrations against Israel's genocide." But Klein believes the least vulnerable should take the lead, especially U.S. tenured professors.

He says: "The time has passed for pleading academic freedom and denying we are anti-semitic; it's time to move in the direction of accusing the accusers. Israeli soldiers are intentionally killing babies and children, shooting boys in their testicles, torturing doctors to death and, more broadly, carrying out the extermination of the entire Palestinian people. This is the worst of humanity and we need to point to them, not just defend ourselves from their empty accusations.

"By defining opposition to genocide as anti-semitic, they've turned anti-semitism into a virtue. Hitler could only have dreamed of this linguistic transformation."

Klein is an active supporter of the cultural and academic boycott of Israel as an important part of the general Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions movement.

He says: "Academics and culture are very important within Israel, so this particular aspect of BDS lends what we think is special leverage to isolate the Zionist state because of its actions. Israeli universities are deeply complicit in the persecution and genocide of Palestinians. May Wind's new book, Towers of Ivory and Steel, documents that very clearly. Focusing on academics is very pertinent to what is going on. And the cultural boycott has a very large impact: everybody recognises when an artist or a musician refuses to go to Israel and states the reasons why."

Klein also advocates for focus to be placed on the boards of trustees of the colleges and universities where the real power lies. Board members are typically very rich with a lot of political power within the country. They come from weapons manufacturing, oil and gas industries and other major corporations. Trump donor, Miriam Adelson, is one example, and he says they are behind the persecution of opponents of genocide.

When asked by Rick Sterling if he has any final comments, Klein responds: "I think the importance of the Palestinians' fight for survival can hardly be overstated. Their struggle is not only for themselves, but it's at the forefront of a worldwide struggle against global fascism."

Manifesto for humanising science

by RICHARD HOUSE

The world needs a new integration of modern science, philosophy and ancient spiritual wisdom – a ‘New Renaissance’

David Lorimer and Oliver Robinson

BELOW are ten core themes which, for me, stood out as the core necessary conditions for humanising science and medicine that emerged in the course of writing my forthcoming book (tinyurl.com/3sudcn2t).

These are harbingers of the evolutionary paradigm-shift that’s so desperately needed in our world, and in which process this newspaper is taking a leading role. The list should not be read as a prescription, or as definitive – merely a conversation-starter on what needs to happen for the humanising of science and medicine to advance.

1. Teasing out and articulating our (metaphysical) assumptions, and their effects. It would be a grave error to assume that this precept is something that all critical thinkers do anyway – far from it! Cultivating doubt in one’s views, and being comfortable with the discomfort of ‘not knowing’ – John Keats’ ‘negative capability’ – are necessary preconditions for being able to fearlessly question our deepest and most consequential assumptions. We should also never underestimate the acute existential anxiety that can stem from the destabilisation and undermining of our most taken-for-granted notions about the world.
2. Actively cultivating free, creative thinking. Based on my teaching experience at university level, the quality of human thinking has been substantially compromised in the current technological age. We’re routinely unaware of the extent to which the free nature of thinking is being radically attenuated, not least by the social-media techno-cultures of so-called ‘communication’ to which so many are addicted, and the stultifying ‘audit culture’ that’s so compromised mainstream education. Education professor, Philip Adey, maintained in 2006 that ‘The intelligence of 11-year-olds has fallen by three years’ worth in the past two decades’, with children today struggling with questions they could have answered 30 years ago. So there’s much to be concerned about here.

3. Outing the (vested) interests and ‘stakeholders’ served by prevailing establishment narratives. The ‘capture’ of science – called out by a courageous Paul Feyerabend half a century ago – is now in plain sight for anyone sufficiently unconditioned by mainstream narratives to witness – as referred to many times in this newspaper. With mainstream-narrative apologists and a complicit, captured media routinely smearing and cancelling anyone who dares question ‘the science’, the ‘experts’, or iatrogenic medical treatments, we need principled, independent media and courageous whistle-blowers in order to have access to reliable, evidenced information on the truth about science’s and medicine’s capture.
4. Embracing holism and related ‘post’-linear-causal epistemologies as an alternative to crass positivism. Holistic thinking in medicine, as an alternative to narrow materialist science, is a vital antidote to the ‘bits-of-person’, symptom-focused approach dominating modern biomedicine. With Arthur Koestler’s notion of holons; philosopher Louis Althusser’s notion of structural causality; Rudolf Steiner’s injunction to start from the whole, and move to the parts (Waldorf education); Jill Hall’s injunction that it’s time for human consciousness to move beyond linear-causal thinking; and philosopher Richard Tarnas advocating ‘a critical reappraisal of the epistemological limits of the conventional scientific approach to knowledge’, and ‘an acknowledgement of the inadequacy
5. Questioning authority and ‘the cult of the expert’. Brian Martin’s 1996 book, Confronting the Experts (tinyurl.com/9skab629) was soon joined in naming the hubris and condescending arrogance of ‘the expert’ by Sheldon Rampton and John Stauber in their 2002 book, Trust Us, We’re the Experts! How Industry Manipulates Science and Gambles with Your Future (tinyurl.com/2hvc55fh), in which they expose the widespread methods that corporations use to influence opinion via bogus experts, doctored data, and manufactured ‘facts’.
6. Taking full responsibility for our own health and understandings of science. Since covid, the importance of ‘doing one’s own research’ has become something of a shibboleth. The inspiring work of Dawn Lester and David Parker (see whatreallymakesyouill.com) is a superb exemplar of intelligent people doing their own research into a given field (in their case, medicine), and finding that many of its core taken-for-granted assumptions are, at the very least, highly contestable. In a society underpinned by ideologies of infantilising ‘expertise’ to which we’re expected unquestioningly to defer, we need proactively to cultivate these capacities, and the trust and self-confidence to embrace such responsibility.
7. Specifying the proper place of science and medicine in society. A century ago, polymath Rudolf Steiner detailed the existence of three basic spheres of society – his so-called ‘Threefold Social Order’ of culture, politics and economics – maintaining that if each sphere could be guided by the ideals of liberté, égalité and fraternité, respectively, then societal functioning would be substantially enhanced. For Steiner, both medicine and science emphatically belonged in the free cultural sphere of society, and both are substantially distorted and harmed if they’re contaminated by either the political or the economic sphere. Thus, the pharmaceutical industry would not then be able to unduly influence the work of scientists or university departments; and governments would not be able to censor research findings to suit their partisan interests and narratives.

8. Embracing the spiritual dimension. Philosopher, Richard Tarnas, bemoans our ‘disenchanted cosmos’ in which nothing is sacred, with the soul of the world having been extinguished – explicitly naming the rampant existential anxiety that is an inevitable accompaniment of a meaningless cosmos, and generating either ‘a collective psychic numbness’ or else ‘an addictive, insatiable craving for ever more material goods to fill the inner emptiness and producing a manic techno-consumerism that cannibalizes the planet’. The work of the Scientific and Medical Network (scimednet.org) is doing vital work in this regard. Paul Feyerabend encapsulates with characteristic brilliance the nature of the problem: ‘Killing in the scientific manner is legal while healing in the non-scientific manner is outlawed... Scientific empiricism [has] eliminated its spiritualistic rivals not by giving a better account of a world that existed independently of either view, but by using a method that did not allow “spiritual” effects to arise.’
9. The urgent need to re-unite science with philosophy. Science without philosophy is always in danger of becoming a mechanistic, unthoughtful practice that reproduces the Kuhnian ‘normal science’ that will simply reinforce the prevailing paradigm in an essentially circular, self-fulfilling fashion. And philosophy without science is always in danger of being ungrounded in the real world (assuming we agree on what the term ‘real world’ connotes!), consumed by abstract, logic-obsessed reasoning exercises that have little if any relevance to our lived human lives.
10. True, authentic science and the free society. True, authentic science can only happen in a genuinely free society. Philosopher of science, Paul Feyerabend, spoke passionately nearly half a century ago about the nature of science in a free society – and what can happen to science in a society that is not free. Here’s Richard Feynman: ‘It’s our responsibility as scientists, knowing the great progress which is the fruit of freedom of thought, to proclaim the value of this freedom; and to demand this freedom as our duty to all coming generations.’

Veterans endure lifetime of guilt

by SERENA WYLDE

THE U.S. and UK face an uphill struggle to recruit and retain military personnel. Small wonder after what the Bush/Blair ‘War on Terror’ unleashed in Afghanistan and Iraq.

A disquieting documentary called America’s Veterans: The War Within, aired by ITV earlier this summer, laid bare the monumental social cost of the conditioning process U.S. combatants went through in these wars. It often resulted in the complete erasure of their humanity, and the consequent loss of their ability to function outside of a context of brutality and aggression.

Documentarian, Deeyah Khan, spent years travelling around the U.S. interviewing veterans, and distilled this labour of patience into a 75-minute documentary. The stirring testimonies featured in the programme are a sample of combatants’ experiences. These veterans are on a path to confronting their actions and accepting what they have become as a consequence. Many others may not even be able to initiate such a journey.

Since 9/11, the U.S. has trained four million military operatives. One in five suffer from Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD). However, Perpetrator Induced Stress is an even more paralysing and serious condition, suffered by those whose guilt endures a lifetime. An estimated 30,000 U.S. veterans have committed suicide since 9/11, more than four times as many as those killed in action. And those who haven’t turned a gun on themselves, are frequently alcohol addicted, wife abusers, and lost to themselves, their families and wider society.

Western powers have long succeeded in projecting the notion that their violence is in the furtherance of ‘good’. It is ‘necessary violence’, ‘justified violence’, and the bombing, killing and maiming of ‘foreign’ civilians is somehow attenuated when it is perpetrated by the political West.

The realisation that this is a lie is devastating for those who were moulded into inflicting that violence, often quite gratuitously.

The veterans spoke of the desensitisation process they underwent through narratives which demonised the Iraqis. They were taught that Iraqis were just targets, not human beings, because ‘they don’t think like us’ or ‘they don’t have our values’.

Iraqis were described in degrading terms, and the language circulating around them was the language they adopted. One veteran said: “You have to demonise people to take a life.” Another spoke of the need to belong to the military fraternity, which was only properly consolidated once one had shot someone. “You are then finally part of the club”, he said.

“House raids,” they said, “were extremely violent for no reason whatsoever, other than our sense of superiority and power. We never found anything.” They confessed to being fuelled by “the supremacy of the empire – the entitlement and the arrogance.”

These veterans, who were courageous enough to be confronting what they did in these overseas lands, had been helped, not by the authorities, but by other veterans and committed wives who have come together and created environments dedicated to the purpose of attempting to recover these lost souls.

Those who have small farms or land have made them available for veterans to meet, discuss their problems, get psychological help, and engage in outdoor activities. One such veteran said: “Coming back to the real world where you can’t solve your problems with violence is difficult. I wanted to remain an angry victim rather than take responsibility for my actions.”

The programme ended with a truth and reconciliation initiative between three Iraqi civilians, who had lost close family and witnessed first-hand snipers shoot and kill children seeking bread, or entering a hospital, and three veterans who openly admitted they had perpetrated similar crimes.

It was a singularly moving exchange, in which the Iraqis only asked ‘why’ and the veterans did not shy away from an honest acknowledgement of their state of mind that led them to commit these atrocities.

I REBEL; therefore I exist. With rebellion, awareness is born.

What is a rebel? A man who says ‘no’.

The only way to deal with an unfree world is to become so absolutely free that your very existence is an act of rebellion.

Poor and free rather than rich and enslaved.

One leader, one people, signifies one master and millions of slaves.

Nothing is more despicable than respect based on fear.

Those who lack the courage will always find a philosophy to justify it.

Contrived removal of a president

Going up against Bush and Israel costly for Carter

by John Hamer

EVEN as a 'Council on Foreign Relations' man, and despite all the attempted control imposed upon him, Jimmy Carter began to veer away from the course that the New World Order brigade had decreed on the very same day that he attained the office of U.S. President.

His first mistake was in firing the all-powerful CIA Director, George H. W. Bush, and 800 others in the agency. Bush had promoted many covert operations' practitioners, aka 'protected agents', to the Justice Department and protected the former Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) director, Richard Helms, who was only given a fine and a suspended sentence for the heinous crime of deliberately lying to Congress.

Bush did not take this snub well – and he certainly did not forget it in a hurry either. But Carter's biggest 'mistake' of all was to overtly act against the interests and the might of Israel and its power over American politics.

In 1977, Carter became the first American president to call for the creation of a Palestinian 'homeland'. He signed the Camp David Accords, which established diplomatic relations between Egypt and Israel, and openly called for the self-governance of the Palestinian people.

After his presidential term, he authored several books on the conflict, including the controversially titled Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid. As for Israel, the Prime Minister, Menachem Begin, was furious about Carter's 'high-handed' actions at Camp David in 1978, which effectively forced Israel to trade the occupied territory of Sinai to Egypt in the peace deal. Begin feared that Carter would use his second term to bully Israel into accepting a Palestinian state on the West Bank that they considered part of Israel's 'divinely granted' territory.

President Carter, President Sadat of Egypt and Prime Minister Begin signed the 'Treaty of Peace between the Arab Republic of Egypt and the State of Israel' on March 26, 1979. However, Begin loathed Carter for the peace agreement forced upon him.

As Begin saw it, the agreement took away Sinai from Israel, did not create a comprehensive peace and left the Palestinian issue still, as he put it, 'hanging around Israel's neck'. So, in order to gain time for Israel to move Jewish settlers into the West Bank in an attempt to short-circuit the agreement, Begin decided that Carter's re-election had to be prevented at all costs.

A new president would undoubtedly give Israel a better opportunity to deal with its problems in its own inimitable way on its northern border with Lebanon.

And so, as a result of this, 'the CIA within the CIA' – the innermost circle of powerful intelligence figures who felt that only they best understood the strategic needs of the United States – believed that Carter and his naive faith in American democratic ideals, represented a grave threat to the nation – or at least to the interests of the uber-wealthy.

These attitudes of 'the CIA within the CIA' and the Israelis appeared to stem from their genuine beliefs that they needed to protect what they regarded as vital interests of their respective countries – aka, themselves. However, the real mystery (or maybe not) is whether or not these two groups treacherously, in league with Republicans, prevented Carter from gaining the release of the 52 hostages then held in Iran and thereby scuppering his re-election hopes.

The answer was that the ousting of Carter, as with Nixon, was a joint MI6/CIA plot sanctioned by the 'powers that shouldn't be'. The entirety of the so-called 'Iranian hostage crisis' was merely the contrived reason to humiliate President Carter, thereby preventing his re-election, much as the contrived Watergate crisis six years earlier had done for his predecessor, President Richard

M. Nixon.

Carter's inability to resolve that hostage crisis did indeed set the stage for Ronald Reagan's landslide victory in November 1980, as American voters reacted to the long-running hostage humiliation by turning to a candidate they believed would be a tougher player on the international stage.

The Iranians initially planned to hold the hostages only briefly, in order to embarrass Jimmy Carter, but according to the ringleaders, 'Carter blinked', resulting in the hostages being held until January, 1981.

Iran eventually released them at almost precisely the same moment that Carter left office and Ronald Reagan was sworn in as the 40th President of the United States. How coincidental! Upon meeting with the freed hostages, Carter declared: "The acts of barbarism which were perpetrated on our people by Iran can never be condoned. It has been an abominable circumstance that will never be forgotten."

And so, the peanut farmer, Council on Foreign Relations and Trilateral Commission member, President Jimmy Carter left high office in disgrace, branded as the worst ever, the liberal, wimp President.

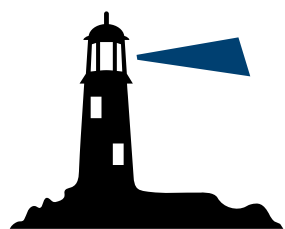

And the 'people' – the ignorant TV-addicted masses – were thus led to believe that those 'big, bad Arabs' released the hostages because they feared the new, tough 'sheriff' that was about to ride into town.

Again, the people were grossly deceived by all this purely political theatre, heavily and convincingly sold to them by the elitist-owned media. And for added measure, in December 1979, the New World Order gang had cunningly enticed the Soviet Union into an invasion of Afghanistan, starting another highly profitable, yet unwinnable war, which is still ongoing at the time of writing, and which further contributes to their agenda.

Reagan's macho, all-American boy image was of course reinforced when the Iranians quickly released the hostages immediately after he was inaugurated in January, 1981, thus ending the 444-day standoff.

This 'coincidence' of timing, which Reagan's supporters cited as proof that foreign enemies feared the new president, also provided momentum to Reagan's wider agenda, including sweeping tax cuts heavily biased towards the wealthy, together with greatly reduced government regulation of corporations, banking and the financial markets.

Letters to TheLIGHT

Love us or hate us, we are helping raise the level of debate in this country and across the world, so we welcome views from all perspectives, because the enemies of free thought and free speech are censorship and group-think. We are all individuals – let's have your thoughts! Please email: letters@thelightpaper.co.uk

Dear The Light,

THIS link – <https://tinyurl.com/8bs3u8ax> - takes you to The Agenda documentary on YouTube.

I thought it was an excellent update/summary of where we are on all the strands of the NWO agenda. It's long, at nearly two hours, and perhaps best watched in two or three goes.

It should be compulsory viewing for all adults who are asleep. The more people who wake up the better, but I don't see how the powerful factions behind it can be ousted and their plans overturned even when they are exposed.

The idea of appealing to government is hopeless when they are part of the problem and the ideals of democracy are long dead. It won't be long before challenging any of this will become illegal and considered subversive. Perhaps a hate crime? They already want this for anyone who doesn't go along with climate change.

Many thanks and keep up the good work.

Ian Smith

Dear The Light,

ON Sunday July 20, at 19:40hrs, I was in my garden in Holland-on-Sea, when I noticed an airliner high up, over the coastline, heading west.

There weren't any vapour trails. Then suddenly a white plume was discharged from its rear, which wasn't continuous but only lasted a few seconds.

As the aeroplane proceeded onwards, the white discharge became a cloud, which then drifted northwards below other clouds, until it went out of sight. Having witnessed this, I would like to know what this discharge consists of? Who manufactures this? And is the aircraft's captain responsible for releasing this substance? And why over

Dear The Light,

A ROYALIST supporter has challenged the criticism of our scam democracy and the part played in it by an unelected billionaire King by asking 'to elect or not'.

Our King, with his 12 palaces, hundreds of properties, duchies and income from this country's extensive coastal waters, enjoys a privileged life and heads a system of inequality and a sham democracy.

However, it is always valuable to read the opinions of others, which is the essence of freedom of speech. Even when it comes from victims of establishment propaganda.

Freedom of speech is the most precious of all, but that is under threat and being denied. Aided and abetted by the distraction of deliberately engineered, mass uncontrolled, illegal and legal immigration. And supported by establishment controlled subliminal mainstream propaganda. Largely, but not exclusively, this area of the Essex coast? What's the purpose behind it? Questions that need answers from a concerned citizen.

Ronnie Knight

Dear The Light,

OUR stickers arrived last week. Thank you, and we thought others might be interested to hear how we propose to use them.

We buy cheap paperback novels from charity shops and put a sticker on the inside cover. We then leave them on park benches and in station waiting rooms, bus shelters, etc. Some we put back on the charity shop shelves for resale.

King Charles III

the BBC. The establishment propaganda machine.

So 'To elect or not?'

Excellent question, but one that philosophers and academics have failed to answer. And maybe there isn't one. But at the very least, it must be brought into the public domain for discussion. Someone, somewhere knows.

Royalist supporters assert the King does his job and does it well. Perhaps.

But what exactly is his 'job' and has it been accurately scrutinised? It is claimed he adds £1.7 billion to our economy, but the establishment is less forthcoming about the details and net benefit once all his costs have been deducted. And that ultimately all his wealth comes from us, the long suffering taxpayer, either directly or indirectly.

The Royals' cost to the taxpayer and the broader economy are deliberately shrouded in mystery.

So what exactly is his job specification?

For example, it would be interesting to have open and transparent reporting of his political involvement at the Privy Councils' secret weekly meetings. And also all the other secret establishment organisations who actually rule Britain.

This country is heading for big trouble and civil disobedience. And the key lies with major reform of the constitution.

Malcolm Naylor

Dear The Light,

THANK you for the very good article, What if my body is brilliant? in issue 59.

Though I have been a follower of natural health my whole life (being brought up by exceptional parents who never went along with anything mainstream), I always find it extremely difficult to explain my knowledge to others who are sceptical of my views and who follow the advice of doctors and conventional medicine.

This article explains it well; not with a lecture about what to do/eat or not do/eat, but by asking relevant and sensible questions which should surely make everyone think for themselves (if that is at all likely in this day and age).

In conjunction with the interview with Dawn Lester in the same issue, this should hopefully lead some people down the right path for future good health.

Keep up the good work!

THE U.S. just imposed sanctions on UN human rights expert, Francesca Albanese – because she spoke out for Gaza.

But what better way to show where the world really stands than build a massive call to give her and the doctors caring for people in Gaza the Nobel Peace Prize?

She spoke out – now the Trump administration is punishing Francesca Albanese, the UN Rapporteur for the West Bank and Gaza, with sanctions.

Meanwhile, she keeps centring those most at risk: everyone struggling in Gaza.

There are millions of us across the world. Nominations for Francesca are gathering steam, please join now.

Together, we can use this moment to show we have her back, and want the world's most prestigious prize to go to her and the doctors caring for people in Gaza.
